"We watched the film and we know that any mistake we make, Nebraska has the talent to take it into the end zone and get seven points for it," he said. "We gotta keep our mistakes low-key. I think that's gonna be the key to winning the game, less turnovers and everybody playing hard every play."

K-State has brought quarterbacks with impressive numbers into the Nebraska game in recent years but still hasn't had any success on the scoreboard. However, one factor setting Bishop apart from previous quarterbacks is his athletic ability.

He has 4.5 speed in the 40-yard-dash, and has shown he can throw the ball more than 60 yards downfield, across his body and on the run.

Watch out

The Nebraska State Highway Patrol will be working overtime on Saturday. They will be looking for speeders and drunk drivers after the Nebraska/K-State game. The Highway Patrol and three other agencies will concentrate their efforts on U.S. Highway 77 from Lincoln, Neb to Marysville, Kan. This will begin after the game.

Cornhuskers can bring out worst in even most level-headed, decent people

VIEWPOINT

DAN MERKER

DAN MERKER is a senior in computer science. You can send your e-mail comments to Dan at dmerker@ksu.edu.

In general, I'm not a mean, hateful or violent person. Really, I'm not. And I consider myself quite open-minded.

But this week, I've been on edge, and I will be until Saturday night. Around 9:30, I will have an emotional release. It will either be one of pure bliss and utter happiness, or great anger and frustration that will probably result in many profanities, thrown punches (at things, never people) and, more than likely, airborne objects that will eventually break.

It's Nebraska week, and I'm on my last nerve. Just hearing the name of that state makes me cringe time and again.

I hate Nebraska and have no problems saying that. I haven't just hated Nebraska since coming to K-State or becoming a Wildcat fan. I've always hated that school and — by association — the state.

Sure, a couple of good things come out of Nebraska. The College World Series is a great sporting event. Many of the Kansas City Royals' stars have played AAA ball in Omaha. One of my best friends in the world lives in Nebraska, but she had the good sense to go to K-State. The K-State volleyball team is made up of three Nebraska natives who had the same good sense as my friend. Other than that, it's pretty worthless.

I never had a real reason to hate Nebraska, but I always have. Many of my attitudes aren't based on logic, just feelings. I'm not quite sure at the time why I have those feelings, but they're usually right on.

Now I know. The place is inherently evil.

All that red. I hate red. It's not too bad with other colors, but red alone just makes me queasy. I can like teams with red in their color schemes, but not only red. In fact, I can't even think of another team, college or pro, with nothing but red.

I think red is indicative of the school. Red is the color of blood. Red is the color of Satan. Lincoln is the devil's fall home. Is it any coincidence the team that ruined the Huskers' three-peat hopes was the Sun Devils? It takes one to beat one.

Red is the color of communists, 72,700 of them, in Memorial Stadium on Saturdays. McCarthy shouldn't have worried about senators and members of the media. He should have gone straight to Lincoln.

Just to show how evil the place is, and how Satan is in control of the state directly to the north, who from the 1995 football team died? Was it Lawrence Phillips, who was accused of beating up his girlfriend? Was it Christian Peter, whose violent, drunken incidents led to the New England Patriots renouncing their rights to him? No, it was the one reasonably likable guy on the team, Brook Berringer. I nearly liked him. But Satan decided that was too much good, so down he goes.

Of course, when I dared say I wish Phillips had died instead of Berringer, some Husker fan nearly killed me with a death-look. No doubt Satan is at work in KSU Stadium, wearing red. Sadly, this person was a K-State student.

It reaches beyond football. Their fans are the worst. Loud and obnoxious, always large in number, regardless of the sport. There's nothing in Nebraska if the devil's team is on the road.

The volleyball team has been reached by Beelzebub. Same evil red, same satanistic power, same obnoxious fans. K-State can't beat them. Nobody can. It's a force even larger than the NCAA. No matter how much I should have, I couldn't force myself to like Lisa Reitsma, all-America outside hitter.

I was even willing to overlook the 9-inch difference in height, but the red uniform, with those eight evil letters, turned me off forever.

The football game Saturday is bigger than just a game. It's more than being in the driver's seat for the Big 12 North title.

It's for K-State. It's for the powers from above.

It's for the free world. It's for all that's good and right. No pressure, Cats.

DB92 to be host to pregame remote

MICHAEL RYAN

Wildcat football fans looking for pregame coverage of the K-State-Nebraska game can turn their radio dials to KSDB-FM 91.9 at 3:30 Saturday afternoon.

The two-hour pregame show will broadcast live from Big Red Keno Sports Bar and Grill in Lincoln, Neb. The show will feature a complete preview of the game, previews and updates from other Big 12 games and interviews with Wildcat players.

Brian Smoller, assistant sports director at DB92, said DB92 encourages K-State fans going to the game to come to Big Red Keno before the game. Big Red Keno is at 955 W. O St. There will be free shuttles before and after the game between the stadium and the restaurant.

"This is an exciting opportunity for our sports staff to be part of a big-time, pregame show," Brent Stover, sports director of DB92, said.

Smoller will be host of the show and be joined by Brandon Romberger and Andy Brunenn.

"Depending on how successful this goes, we'll be able to do live remotes from other away games and hopefully a bowl game," Smoller said. "This is the next step for DB92 to bring quality K-State coverage to Manhattan."

Len Potillo, DB92 general manager, said Big Red Keno contacted DB92 about doing the remote.

"They thought we'd be the best station to represent Manhattan and get the best draw," Potillo said.

"They were very excited the K-State station would do it. We'll be the only Manhattan station there."

Smoller said the station does not have enough underwriting to carry the actual game. Efforts are under way to get more underwriting to carry future road games, he said.

DB92 is also broadcasting all the home games this year for the first time. Each home-game broadcast starts 30 minutes before kickoff.

The semi-final round of Pecs on the Patio allows 13 contestants to battle it out in 3 categories with the winners advancing to prizes and money.

BEARING IT FOR FUN

STORY BY CHRIS DEAN • PHOTOS BY NICK HERRIAGE

With the success of the Beauty on the Beach contest, Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon has decided to give men their turn to strut their stuff.

Wednesday marked the first round of semi-finals for Pecs on the Patio, a contest co-sponsored by KMKF-FM 101.5 and Chance.

Thirteen contestants were judged in three rounds, including formal wear, casual wear and the boxer round, which lasted from 9 p.m. to around 1 a.m.

Debbie Sexton and J.B. Morrison, co-hosts of K-Rock's morning show, emceed the event.

"Contestants have to answer a question and then they dance around a bit," Mike Hodges, assistant manager at Chance and senior in management, said. "It's a little like body building with questions thrown in."

Five judges score the contestants in each round and write out comments, but the score is largely determined by audience response, Cindy Sellers, sales and promotions assistant for K-Rock, said.

"We tell the guys to go out and have fun," she said. "We do ask them to keep it tasteful, though."

Although there are no specific guidelines for the participants, one contestant proved not everything goes.

During the boxer round, Alan Yerich, freshman in arts and sciences, mooned the audience.

Although Yerich's action did not warrant being cut from the contest, Rusty Wilson, owner of Chance, said it was in bad taste and did not help his chances.

"We certainly don't condone that behavior. The men are told no lewd acts or nudity. It happened," he said. "If they do pull a stunt like that, they're the ones who look bad."

Sellers agreed that the mooning did not go over well with the judges or the audience.

"It was a little distasteful, and I don't think the contestants should do things like that unless they have something that will really impress the judges," she said. "Everyone was more put out than impressed."

Semi-finalists were drawn from people who signed up and participated in the preliminary round Sept. 24. Wednesday, seven men made it on to the finals that will be Oct. 15. Six additional finalists will continue on after next Wednesday's event.

"This is a chance for people to come down here and get involved, and it's something different," Wilson said. "We're really pleased with how it's going. It's something fun. We've had no bad responses."

Winners from the semi-final rounds received gift certificates and prizes from the various sponsors. The winner will receive prizes and a cash award yet to be finalized.

Station Cafe opens to larger audience

SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
staff writer

Saturday night Union Station will be host to the semester's fourth Station Cafe sponsored by the Union Program Council Eclectic Entertainment Committee, KSU Campus Ministries and KHCA-FM 95.3.

Doors will open for the admission-free event at 8 p.m., and the show will begin at 9 p.m. with local bands FivefootTwelve and Beggar's Table. A dance is then scheduled to follow from 11 p.m. to 1 a.m. with music provided by Station Cafe Coordinator Ryan Crowell as disc jockey.

The theme for the evening is "Beat Nebraska Night" and anyone attending is encouraged to wear purple to be eligible to win prizes from drawings.

Eclectic Entertainment Chairman Douglas Lacy said although Station Cafe is a revamped version of Christian Dance Night, religion is not the issue. "It's not going to church by any means," Lacy said.

Crowell, who calls the event a sort of "Christian coffeehouse," said the idea behind the event was to branch out for an audience beyond just the Christian following.

"We wanted to mainstream the approach a bit," he said.

Originally, he said, Christian Dance Night ran the entire program. Crowell shortened the actual dance portion down to two hours, added two hours of live band performance and has the doors open an hour before the band begins playing to allow people to come in and mix, playing cards or board games provided at Union Station.

"We don't want to be a concert," Crowell said. "We want a fellowship format."

Lacy said attendance has been good with the first Station Cafe bringing in about 350 people, the second about 175 and the third about 300.

"We try to focus on local acts for our entertainment," Crowell said, adding that he hopes for an attendance of around 400 tonight.

FLINT HILLS LITERARY FESTIVAL

Stafford's work to take spotlight

LINDSEY FORTMEYER
staff writer

K-State's Department of English introduces the first Flint Hills Literary Festival tonight and Saturday.

This year's festival theme, "The Life and Writing of William Stafford," focuses on the work of poet William Stafford, a Kansas native.

Stafford, who died in 1993, has been recognized as one of America's most predominant poets of the second half of the 20th century. Some of Stafford's best-known works are "Stories that Could Be True: New and Collected Poems" and "An Oregon Message."

"We needed a fall event to sponsor creative writing," said Steve Heller, director of creative writing at K-State and coordinator of the festival. "We chose Stafford as a focus for the festival because he is the best-known Kansas poet. He re-accessed writing and has had an important impact on American literature."

He said he thought the theme of the festival would draw audiences from around the country.

"We've received invitations for proposals from around the world," Heller said. "We're anticipating representatives from institutions from all over Kansas."

Those who attend the festival events will have the opportunity to hear writers, scholars and critics discuss their thoughts on Stafford's work, as well as hear new creative work by other writers.

"Stafford's writing has a strong sense of place," she said. "He has an influential moral vision in his works, and a spiritual sense, but he's not ideological in any way."

Among the events, poet and essayist Kim Stafford, the son of William Stafford, will deliver a keynote address at 6 tonight in the auditorium of the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art. His address, titled "Living by the Light and Darkness of William Stafford," talks about growing up in the Stafford household and his life as a poet. Kim Stafford is the author of "Having Everything Right: Essays of Place," which won the Western States Book Award and several other works, including the recent long poem "Apple Bough Soliloquy."

Saturday, a number of readings and presentations will take place in the K-State Student Union. These events include a workshop by Charles Kempthorne, "Writing Personal and Family Histories," and several featured guest writers.

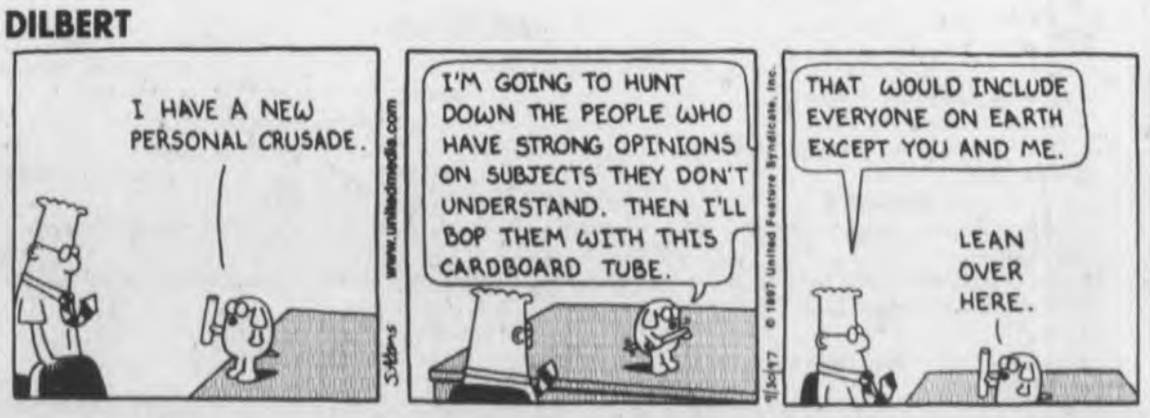
Other presentations Saturday include talks by State Street Press editor Judith Kitchen; Stafford editor and Michigan State professor Laura Apol; a fiction reading by Richard Spilman of Wichita State University; and a closing lecture and question-and-answer session with Jonathan Holden, distinguished professor of English and K-State poet-in-residence.

"Holden will close the festival with the literary legacy of Stafford, teaching terms Stafford introduced in his poetry and teachings," Heller said.

Holden wrote the first scholarly book about Stafford.

"I'll assemble sayings by Stafford, talk about his great teachings and recite sayings from his works," Holden said.

Holden said Stafford's appeal should make for interest in the festival.



"He is an accessible poet and popular poet from Kansas," Holden said. "That should make people draw to the festival."

Schedules for the festival are at the registration desk in Union 212. Events are free.

dollars apiece. He said this is mostly because pro-profit publishers have taken over much of the market, when once all the journals were printed by nonprofit scholarly organizations.

Provost James Coffman has organized a committee to examine the process.

Ossar's other problem is that there are many other publications that UnCover doesn't carry, particularly in humanities.

UnCover only carries publications written in English. A lot of scholarly work can't be written in English, such as work by French scientists, which by their law must be published in French, Ossar said.

What's more, he said, there's little to stop UnCover from raising its prices from what it charges now. UnCover must pay for the journals it keeps on its database, to the same organizations that print the journals.

Ossar, who was once an editor of such a journal, said if the university cuts the number of subscriptions, the publishers will immediately raise their prices to absorb their own losses.

Ossar senses the prices will eventually be pushed onto the students, which he said goes against the idea of a university.

He suggested that fund-raising efforts could be made to earmark a small percentage of donations, with permission of the donor. He also said the library should have a full-time staff of representatives to apply for grants.

"If there's anything they (university officials) have a responsibility to maintain, it's the library," he said.

SPEECH

Lexis/Nexus was recently sold to a European publication company. The American affiliate, Reed-Elsenier, eliminated the discount. This year Farrell would pay $69,000 for similar unlimited use through several ports.

A possible solution might be to pursue joint access with other universities.

"We're finding it very advantageous to go into joint purchasing with KU," Hobrock said. "It's more money, but more access."

The financial worries stem from proposed budget cuts. In fiscal year 1997, the budget for speech journals was $4,800. For fiscal year 1998, the library has proposed a reduced budget of $3,700, Hobrock said.

"There's been a request by the library administration to cut journal budgets by 30 percent," said David Procter, head of the Department of Speech, Communication, Theater and Dance.

The average journal for the speech department costs only $75, which is low when compared with the average cost of other journals, Hobrock said. Some journals cost as much as $1,200 for a one-year subscription. He said he sees a problem with weighing the importance of some journals over others.

Hobrock said he sees no immediate solution to the periodical dilemma.

"It's a university problem, but it's much deeper than that," Hobrock said. "It goes far beyond. It's a worldwide problem."

Faculty members said they could not be certain what effect the cuts would have on their teaching standards until the list was made final, but Rodgers said he thought the students would feel the effects most.

"Not only do they lose access to important ideas, but also, they lose faculty who take jobs where there's a better commitment to the library," Rodgers said.

Even without the cuts, Dodd said she felt the journal supply was at a minimum.

"There were journals that I thought we really needed to have, which we didn't," she said. "We didn't have a surplus that we could afford to cut from. What we had really was a bare minimum to have reasonable instruction and research."

Woman shoots at authorities, avoids doctors

ROBY, Ill. — Taking a 51-year-old widow in for a court-ordered psychological exam was supposed to be routine, meant to ease the concerns of her family.

Instead, it has turned into an 11-day standoff at her home in the cornfields of central Illinois.

Shirley Ann Allen met sheriff's deputies at the door with a shotgun on Sept 22. Since, she has withstood a tear gas attack and fired twice at troopers surrounding her house in a rural, sparsely populated neighborhood near Springfield.

Troopers and deputies have played her favorite music to soothe her and tried unsuccessfully to talk to her by telephone and through a bullhorn. Today, they decided to pull back, reducing the number of law enforcement agents and removing floodlights and loudspeakers they had directed at the house.

BISHOP

"I would kill for his athletic ability," Miller said. "He's really something special, and I don't even try to compare myself to that. I liked to run around, but I couldn't get away from people like him. I could get about 10 yards and that was it."

In the first three games against Mid-American Conference teams, Bishop has showed off his ability to elude defenders. On one play against Ohio, Bishop ran at least 50 yards across the field, broke out of three would-be sacks and threw the ball more than 60 yards downfield across his body while being hit. The pass was completed.

Bishop is also K-State's third-leading rusher.

K-State coach Bill Snyder is happy that Bishop's speed adds to the depth of the Cats' offensive attack, but he said he has concerns about Bishop.

"When Matt was our quarterback two years ago, he had mobility and did create some things that might not otherwise occur," Snyder said.

"Certainly, both of them have a mobility edge over (1996 K-State quarterback) Brian (Kavanagh), but mobility is a two-way street. It can get you into some good plays, but it can get you into some bad plays, too."

In addition to dealing with the defense Nebraska puts on the field, Bishop will have to deal with the Huskers in the stands.

Memorial Stadium has a reputation as one of the toughest venues for opposing teams.

However, the Cats have been preparing for the decibel increase by practicing with loud stadium noise blaring out of speakers. K-State practiced with the noise once during the beginning of camp, twice last week and twice this week.

Memorial Stadium's seating capacity is 72,700. The Huskers' stadium holds a lot more enemies than Bishop ever had at Blinn.

"I experienced some big crowds that didn't like us at junior college, but going up to Nebraska, I'm pretty sure it's gonna be so loud, and I know the fans are gonna be getting on to us," Bishop said. "But we can't worry about this."

where we can just walk away from it and leave (her) on her own," State Police Director Terrance Gainer said. "She definitely poses a threat to people who may wander onto her property."

Two nearby homes were evacuated, and the neighbors will not be allowed to return until the standoff is resolved, he said.

Allen, a former nurse, has an abundance of food she has canned herself, Christian County Sheriff Dick Mahan said. Neighbors said she hunted with her husband, who died of pancreatic cancer in 1989, and is familiar with weapons and bow hunting.

Allen, while reclusive, was amiable over the years, though her relatives said she grew depressed after the death of her husband. Neighbors noticed some changes this year. Her yard, always a beauty, became unkempt. They saw less of her.

Her brother and mother tried to visit her on Labor Day weekend but she refused to see them, Mahan said. When she didn't respond, the sheriff and a neighbor tried to contact her with no luck.

Negotiators had tried for days to communicate with Allen every 15 minutes, including putting relatives on to plead with her to surrender.

For the first time Tuesday night, they cut off communication to give her a chance to rest and will not try to talk with her again.

Troopers also have stopped playing her favorite classical music and pop tunes, including Barry Manilow and the Beatles, during the day.

Measure for Measure
Friday, October 3, 8p.m.
Public: $18, Seniors: $16, Students: $9
Will Isabella trade her virginity for her brother's life? That's her dilemma as she pleads to save her brother, who has been sentenced to death for impregnating his unmarried lover. It may sound like an R-rated movie, but this, folks, is Shakespeare.
Measure for Measure is one of Shakespeare's most well-crafted plays, but is often overlooked in favor of the more famous tragedies, histories, and comedies. By today's standards it is a "dark" comedy that probes both the relationship of law and morality in the state and human behavior under stress. Don't miss out when Actors from the London Stage perform this morally intriguing play.
Call McCain at 785-532-6428
You can charge your tickets to VISA, MasterCard, or Discover. Or stop by the box office, noon to 6 p.m. weekdays.
On-campus residency activities are supported by the K-State Fine Arts Fee.

It's final: Farrell becomes Hale

JEFF COOPER/Collegian

PRESIDENT JON WEFALD, right, assists in unveiling the new sign for Hale Library on Sunday afternoon. "For all of you that contributed $5, $5,000 or $3 million, thank you, thank you, thank you and God bless you," Wefald said. The library's transformation from Farrell into Hale cost $30 million dollars and took five years to complete. A contribution from the Hale family helped the project so much the library's name was changed.

▶ ADMINISTRATION THANKS STUDENTS, BENEFACTORS for support of renovation.

JAMI NELSON
staff reporter

Credit was given where it was due as K-State welcomed its newest addition, Hale Library, Sunday afternoon.

Farrell Library officially became Hale Library during a dedication ceremony at 1 p.m. outside the library's southwest entrance.

Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries, welcomed the crowd of community members, campus and state leaders, past and present students and the Joe and Joyce Hale family. The Hales are the chief private financial contributors and the library's new namesakes.

"This achievement belongs to all of us," Hobrock said.

Hobrock offered thanks to the architects, contractors, designers and negotiating committee. He also recognized the library staff for its patience during the library's reconstruction.

"THIS ACHIEVEMENT BELONGS TO ALL OF US."
BRICE HOBROCK, DEAN OF LIBRARIES

"They endured five years of design and construction," Hobrock said. "They are the true survivors."

President Jon Wefald thanked the students for their contributions.

"If it had not been for the students, we would not be here today," he said.

Wefald mentioned the efforts of past student body presidents to raise support for the library's renovation. Their initiative was joined by the support of the Hale family.

"Thank goodness to Joe and Joyce Hale for stepping up to bat," he said.

Wefald described the fund-raising efforts as a three-legged stool. K-State students and the Hale family constituted the first two legs with the state legislature as the third.

"For all of you that contributed $5, $5,000 or $3 million, thank you, thank you, thank you and God bless you," Wefald said.

Representing the student population were three student body presidents — two past and one present.

Todd Johnson, former student body president, discussed his initial push for an improved library.

When campaigning for president, Johnson's campaign T-shirt listed his election issues on the back. One of the concerns addressed the library: "Is it possible to just nuke the library and start over."

And so began the students' renovation efforts. The campaign for an improved library, symbolized by a bull's eye, included different promotion levels. They included writing letters to state legislators, lobbying more intensely, planning and designing the renovation and, finally, breaking ground.

"I'd like to thank the students who kept the pressure up over the years," Johnson said.

Racial & Ethnic Harmony

Storytelling and a push for change began Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week on Sunday night.

A Harmony Walk that started and ended at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art was organized to promote diversity within the community, Sherry Wright, Harmony Walk organizer, said.

"This year, the purpose we were trying to fulfill was in the community," Wright said. "We wanted to be out there, to be visible and to let the community know that there are people of all races and ethnicities in this town and that we can all live together."

K-State students and faculty from many different organizations attended the Harmony Walk to show their support for the week. The walk helps unite the Manhattan community and the K-State community, Liz Carson, senior in management, said.

"The Harmony Walk meant everyone in Manhattan coming together, uniting and working for a cause in Manhattan," Carson said.

This year, the Harmony Walk also included storytellers along the walk route, Wright said. They told stories about their ethnic backgrounds and about how they relate to the community.

"The walk symbolizes something that's truly important to Manhattan, Kansas — that we are becoming a more diverse society," Wright said.

Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week features programs focusing on various issues, including achieving racial harmony, Barbara Baker, Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week organizer, said.

"We have programs that are addressing how to better improve our communications and our interactions with each other," Baker added.

The week will feature forums and speakers on topics about minority students in residence halls, religion and grassroots elements of racial harmony.

"We hope the awareness goes beyond this week," Baker added. "Racial harmony needs to happen each and every day."

Speeches, film promote Coming Out Week 1997

LANCE SCHOEN

The K-State chapter of the Bisexual and Gay and Lesbian Society will celebrate Coming Out Week 1997 with more than 200 other colleges throughout the country Oct 6-11.

BGLS President Paul Donovan said the week's topics range from homosexuality in the family to homosexual issues in the media. There will also be two showings of "Stonewall," a movie about the beginning of the gay rights movement that started in the late 1960s and early 1970s.

"These events are for all students to attend," Donovan said.

Donovan also said he hopes Coming Out Week 1997 will encourage people who might think they are gay to not be afraid and also to educate people about homosexuals.

"We hope to get people to learn about gay people and that gay people don't need to hide," Donovan said.

The BGLS society at K-State is slowly growing every year and has between 30 and 40 members. The group meets twice a month and also sponsors socials at K-State, as well as with other schools in the area.

"It's a way for gay and lesbian people to get together and meet other people," Donovan said.

COMING OUT WEEK

The following events will take place from 7:30 to 9 p.m. today though Wednesday in Union 212.

Today	Homosexuality and the law Maz Mavsovitz speaks about his recent challenges to the constitutionality of Kansas sodomy laws.
Tuesday	What will my parents think? Parents of homosexuals and homosexuals who are parents talk about the challenges of dealing with homosexuality in the family and answer questions.
Wednesday	You can't say that! Speech instructor Susan Stanfield; John A. Filter, adviser to the ACLU on campus and assistant professor of political science; and Scott M. Lodd, editor in chief of the Collegian, address the issue of hate speech on college campuses and discuss the First Amendment and its applications.

K-STATE VS. KU: A COMPETITION THAT MAKES A DIFFERENCE

Red Cross continues blood drive rivalry

▶ HALF OF POPULATION could donate blood, but only 5 percent choose to give.

ANDREA COREY
senior staff writer

Once again, K-State and the University of Kansas will fight it out to see who can draw the most blood.

This week is the blood-drive competition between K-State and Kansas for the American Red Cross.

Nancy Powell, donor resource consultant for American Red Cross, said the competition is good because even those without athletic ability can compete.

"This is the kind of situation everyone can relate to," she said.

The competition was started by the Red Cross in 1994, and so far the Wildcats have done well.

"There was Wildcat possession for every semester but one," she said.

She said the main benefit of giving blood is to help the community, but free cholesterol screenings are also mailed to donors.

Donations at K-State are not above average, but Powell said many more students are eligible to donate.

Fifty percent of the nation's population are able to give blood, but only 5 percent of that number actually donate. K-State's numbers still fall around 5 percent.

Often potential donors are afraid, Powell said.

"If we get them over that initial fear of giving blood, they continue to give," she said.

▶ Get an A for effort.
The Collegian editorial board gives those who might be reluctant a list of reasons to roll up their sleeves and give a little to the blood drive.

News Rewind collects the top campus, local, state, national and world news from the past 48 hours. Briefs are collected from wire and staff reports.

Victim, city protest molester's bid for position on school board

DENVER — I. Lee McClendon Sr. did jail time, served probation and had therapy after he molested an 8-year-old boy. He said he is rehabilitated and wants to help society — as a member of the Denver School Board.

McClendon, 52, said he has paid for his crime and accuses his critics of acting on emotion, not reason. After 90 days in jail and group and individual therapy, McClendon said, the chances that he will molest a child again are "nonexistent."

His criminal past was revealed last month when his victim mailed each school board member a letter saying McClendon was a danger to school children.

"He should not be allowed on the school board or into any position which puts him in authority over children," the victim wrote. "He should not make policy for children's education. He lost any such privilege when he molested me and my brother."

McClendon admits fondling one boy but denies molesting his brother.

He was charged in 1984 with aggravated incest but pleaded guilty to a lesser charge of attempted sexual assault on a child, a felony.

He has since started a company that provides technical writing and editing services. He said he is running for the school board post because he has noticed a decline in the ability of Denver students to read, write and do basic math.

Suspect arrested in double murderx after shooting himself in the head

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — A suspect suffering from what was believed to be a self-inflicted gunshot wound to the head was arrested at a hospital Saturday after police found two people fatally shot in a southside home.

Police were called to the home about 3 a.m. after gunshots were heard. Officers went through an open front door and found Nicohle Thomas, 28, and Robert Harris, 33, dead in a bedroom.

Alvin Williams, 29, the woman's ex-boyfriend, was arrested and charged with two counts of first-degree murder, two counts of armed criminal action and one count of first-degree burglary.

He was arrested at Research Medical Center, where he went for treatment. Williams apparently shot himself in the head at his ex-girlfriend's house, but the bullet only grazed his head, authorities said.

Landlord hires hitman to murder tenants so he can increase rent

NEW YORK — A Manhattan landlord is accused of paying a teen-ager to drug tenants with heroin and set fire to an apartment so he could get rid of the occupants and charge a higher rent.

Landlord Mark Glass is accused of paying the alleged hit man about $4,000 to kill a woman living at his Lower East Side apartment building after having already paid the teen to set fire to a man's apartment.

Glass, who has several aliases and is reportedly worth millions, was charged Wednesday with attempted murder, conspiracy and arson. He is being held without bail. His lawyer, Raphael Scotto, called the charges "preposterous."

Despite the charges, other tenants and tenant associations defended Glass, saying he is a good landlord.

"He's not that bad," neighborhood tenant advocate Frank Morales said Friday. "I don't know. He may have had enough, and he might've cracked."

Police said Glass has at least eight aliases, four addresses, two birth dates, three Social Security numbers and driver's licenses for three countries. Despite real-estate holdings worth millions, he claims to earn $52,000 a year, prosecutors said.

Falling tree crushes woman, infant

BIG BEAR LAKE, Calif. — A man illegally chopping down a 100-foot tree for firewood watched in horror as it fell on his fianc'ee and their infant son, crushing them both to death.

Keith Rademaker Jr. had been chopping at the Douglas fir for nearly an hour when a gust of wind toppled it over Friday morning. Rademaker's fianc'ee, Cari Ann Clark, was taking their 5-month-old son, Aaron, out of a safety seat in the car at the time.

"All I could do was yell 'No!' I couldn't believe it," Rademaker said. "It happened so fast they hardly knew what hit them."

The infant died of a skull fracture, and his 30-year-old mother was killed after suffering broken ribs and a broken leg and ankle.

BARBARA BAKER founded Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week eight years ago. Baker, academic services coordinator and McNair Scholars Program coordinator for Educational Supportive Services at K-State, is this year's Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week director.

Barbara Baker

remembers brother, dreams through harmony week

LAURA POPE
staff reporter

After her brother's death, Barbara Baker was reminded of the need for racial and ethnic awareness. Baker said she realized this would be a life-long progression.

"My brother had a difficult time dealing with racism in his life," Baker said. "I wanted to do something about this issue and do something for the world."

Baker had a dream she turned into reality. Many students take part in her dream every day and many more will this week. The dream was to create a celebration that would get students of all races involved with more issues and activities on campus, she said.

Baker began Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week in 1989.

"I had help bringing this concept ahead, but said this is my time and I'm going to try to make a difference," Baker said.

A graduate of K-State, Baker received her bachelor's degree in journalism and mass communications and master's degree in college personal services. After college, Baker worked as a vocational rehabilitation counselor with the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services.

"I valued that experience very much," Baker said. "It taught me the diversities of the world. It reconfirmed my idea to make a difference in the world."

Baker is the academic services coordinator and McNair Scholars Program coordinator for Educational Supportive Services at K-State. She took the job with the university three years ago.

Racial & Ethnic Harmony

Baker's job duties require her to assist with academic advising, supervise the tutoring program, mentor scholar students and teach Academic Multicultural Enrichment.

"I enjoy teaching the class," she said. "It's a wonderful opportunity to inspire their leadership. We have some wonderful leaders going into the 21st century that are going to make a difference for multiracial harmony and equality."

Since its beginning in 1989, Baker has always found time to coordinate Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week. One of her goals is to go back to graduate school and develop a concept so other schools and communities can implement their own week to recognize this issue.

"Education is the key to getting people to embrace each other more and understand people more," she said.

An active member of several groups in Manhattan, Baker was the co-founder of the Manhattan Community Harmony Association. She has also participated in the Manhattan Alliance of Peace and Justice Board and the Martin Luther King Community Observation Planning Committee.

Baker said she has set up a scholarship in her brother's name to take a tragedy and turn it around to promote the growth of young people.

She said she was inspired by Carl McNair, whose brother, Ronald McNair, died in the Challenger space shuttle explosion. The McNair Scholars Program is named after Ronald McNair.

"Carl McNair started a scholarship to promote his brother's name, education and the talent of youth," Baker said. "Although they died under different circumstances, the purpose is the same — to turn a tragedy around to help young people."

Hale addition erases past 70 years; classic building hides new technology

RUSSELL FORTMEYER

Hale Library commentary

It's been precisely 70 years since the gothic, limestone-clad Farrell Library was finished and a campus landmark was born.

With the dedication of the 350,000-square-foot, $28 million Hale Library, designed by Brent Bowman and Associates, it's as if those 70 years have been effectively erased — the two, awful additions following the original building and their crummy circulation patterns absorbed into Hale. Bowman has contextualized the building to the point where there is no line between old and new.

The building pretends Denison Hall was never built (almost preying on Denison being torn down). It gallantly peers over Lafene Health Center, suggesting the small fry of campus buildings should bow in fear.

In many ways Hale was designed not for the present or future, but for the past. It aligns itself with early 20th-century traditionalism, a new building wrapped in traditional pretensions. It also continues a tradition, for better or worse, of collegiate gothic architecture and the Richardson Romanesque of such buildings as Holton Hall.

No doubt many who will visit Hale will consider it to be in good taste, much like nostalgic New Yorkers in 1912 found the historicist New York Public Library or contemporary Chicagoans their new historicist public library, designed by Hammond Beeby and Babka Inc., the firm that worked with Bowman on Hale.

Hale isn't nearly as inaccessible and confusing a building as the Chicago Public Library. And it does cohere with repeated details and architectural elements that play to the original 1927 building.

The interior of Hale could not be more inviting. Soft pastels paired with darker wintry colors give the interior a poshness, no doubt heightened by the substantial use of dark wood, plush furniture and Kansas-inspired metalwork details.

Hale refuses the high-tech, computerized look of most new libraries and instead embraces a library design ethos synonymous with the old world of paper and ivy-covered halls of academia.

Looks can deceive. There are computers and electronic classrooms in Hale and recent attention to electronic means for acquiring journal articles is sure to mean more technology. If anything, Hale proves you can wrap the techno-world of the 21stcentury in historicist guise.

ANDREW MARCINIAK/Collegian

Central to the organization of each floor and to the success of the new library, is a "circus maximus." It acts as a circular pedestrian walkway that unites each floor and allows easy access between the original building, the stacks and the larger east addition. If Hale had to accomplish one thing, it was the unification of the old maze that was Farrell.

Adjacent to the circus are study pockets allowing this large building to seem quite personable and usable — a good place to hole up and get some reading done or plug in a lap-top and type away.

Bowman was also charged with making this large building fit into the uneven campus plan. Hale embraces the central campus path and extends its southwest loggia to pedestrians. The first-floor entrance also addresses the green space east of Anderson Hall.

And while the building pays almost literal homage to Fairchild, Holton and Dickens halls, it also rises sternly above them. Its commanding southwest stair tower, replete with crenelations and gothic window a la Castle Von Hale, overshadows the elder statesman of campus buildings, Seaton Court.

There are noble statements made in Hale. The southwest entrance loggia and so-called Hall of Scholars, with their soaring, vaulted ceilings and post-modern chandeliers, do give one the sense of arrival necessary for a great building and subtly allude to the grandeur of the 1927 third-floor reading room without attempting to upstage it.

But the southeast first-floor entrance, with its Romanesque arch and intricate metal detailing, is too big a statement for such a paltry, meaningless entry. The building can be insensitive at other times, such as the rigid symmetry of windows of the west facade that leave alternating interior offices dark or the blank squeeze of the northeast exterior corner.

While there are innumerable considerations with a building of this size, a larger issue looms: what to make of K-State's unflinching embrace of traditionalism.

Not for a second can one believe a modernist departure from the original Farrell would have suited the needs of the campus, but can such literalism?

In an age with no clear direction in architecture, albeit a resurgence of contextualism (in this case, a disguise for traditionalism), how can people pride themselves on a building that presents nothing more than its own newness?

While surely no one will argue against Hale's erasure of its architectural past, who is speaking for its lack to hail a future?

HELPING YOU BUILD A SECURE FINANCIAL FUTURE IS AN IMPORTANT JOB. FORTUNATELY, WE HAVE THE PERFECT RESUME.

With nearly 80 years of leadership experience in our field, TIAA-CREF is eminently qualified to help you build a comfortable, worry-free retirement.

Our references are equally impeccable — today, nearly two million of the best minds in America trust us with their financial future.

Allow us to review our qualifications.

Superior strength

With over $200 billion in assets, TIAA-CREF is the world's largest retirement organization — and among the most solid. TIAA is one of only a handful of companies to have earned top ratings for financial strength, and CREF is one of Wall Street's largest investors.†

Solid, long-term performance

We seek out long-term opportunities that other companies, in pursuit of quick gains, often miss. Though past performance can't guarantee future results, this patient philosophy has proven extremely rewarding.

Surprisingly low expenses

TIAA-CREF's operating costs are among the lowest in the insurance and mutual fund industries. Therefore, more of your money goes where it should — towards ensuring your future.

Easy diversification

We offer a wide variety of expertly managed investment options to help build your assets. With stock, bond, money market, and real estate accounts — as well as a guaranteed annuity to choose from — TIAA-CREF makes diversification easy.

Unrivaled service

We believe that our service distinguishes us from every other retirement company. In the latest Dalbar Consumer Satisfaction Survey, a study of 2,000 financial companies, TIAA-CREF was voted the leading provider of retirement plans.

Show your true wildcat spirit, help others by donating blood

Think you're a true K-Stater? Then be sure to tap a vein for the Cats this week during the American Red Cross Blood Drive and see if you really bleed purple.

Even if your blood is an unsightly Nebraska-esque red, it's crucial that you donate. Not only will you be helping to beat the University of Kansas in number of pints received, you'll also be lending a helping vein to someone who needs blood.

However, just because you have a giving heart doesn't guarantee you'll be able to pass your blood along. If you've been sick recently, you'll most likely be turned away. Also, if you've been tattooed or pierced lately, chances are you won't be allowed to donate.

We won't sugar coat it — donating blood can hurt a bit. But while you're lying there, think of it as a time to relax while doing a world of good for someone else. When you've given your pint, you not only get tasty snacks, you also get a sticker. Show it off to your friends, and they'll be lining up to donate, too.

The unsettling reality about donating blood is that 50 percent of the American population qualifies to donate blood, but only 5 percent actually does. Parallel to that, only about 5 percent of K-Staters donate when the blood drive rolls around.

In August, the Central Plains Region of the American Red Cross experienced a shortage of four blood types. That trend caught on nationwide. When you donate blood, you're helping to stop such shortages.

Aside from being in general good health and not recently adorned, you also must be at least 17 years old and weigh 110 pounds or more to donate blood.

To help yourself out on the big day of donation, be sure to drink a lot of liquid so you can be in tip-top shape. Donating blood can be a little taxing, so expect to be tired for the rest of the day.

There's hardly anything simpler you can do to help people out in the short hour in takes to give blood.

Wildcat proud

No other campus quite so open

I remember being cold.

It could have been October. It might also have been November. The exact date is irrelevant. The wind was whipping the dry leaves in little whorls about my feet, and the sky was the hue of deep stone. The raw chill hung in the air and enveloped everything like some great blanket, sending chills down the spine to foreshadow the afterlife. Little puffs of air condensed immediately after coming out of my mouth as I exhaled.

Winter was approaching, and I had a runny nose.

JON KURCHE

JON KURCHE is a freshman in physics. You can send e-mail to Jon at jsk6609@ksu.edu

Sniffling, I stepped into the imposing building in front of me. Written on the left side, in large, purple letters, were the words "K-State Student Union." I strode past them, through the double doors and into the lobby. It was Shawnee County Senior Day.

I had been busy my senior year. Busy because I believed that out-of-state was the way to go, that the only way to have a fighting chance in life was by applying to the Ivy League, and that the only way to get Ivy League was by killing yourself and hoping they would still accept you as a corpse. My counselors and academic advisers had taught me to believe that all my life, so what was I doing in Manhattan?

Nevertheless, here I was. K-State had been very vocal about wanting me to attend school here. At home, the stack of propaganda had overwhelmed the kitchen table and had taken up residence in piles on the floor.

I liked the piles. Never mind that we had no place to eat during my senior year. The piles made me feel needed, wanted, cherished. I couldn't understand why K-State would be showing so much attention to me, but I figured a visit was the least I could do to reward their effort.

Now, nearly a year later, I sit in the quasi-office space provided by a cubicle divider and some file cabinets, which sets the desk apart from the open room. The sun is shining brightly through the glass in Eisenhower Hall, and the woman who sits across from me has her hands folded and is looking out the window. The light coming through is highlighting a few of her stray hairs while the rest is tied up into a neat bun.

"It seems so darn self-perpetuating to me," Beth Powers, scholarship adviser, said as she turned to face me. "People on this campus are so supportive of what I do down through administration, faculty, staff and students. It's a nice environment to walk into on a job."

Powers is in charge of helping students win scholarship competitions. The Rhodes, the Trumans, the Marshalls, the Goldwaters, the Udalls — on and on. More than 800 are available, and they're open to anyone. You. Me. The guy across the hall who plays the loud music. People we know, friends and partners. Everybody.

Powers asks me if I could see myself as a scholar.

"We don't like it to be an elitist process," she says. "Anybody's welcome to come in and ask me about scholarships anytime. It's what I do."

The open door is typical of K-State policy. It was on that cold, Shawnee County Senior Day morning when I first realized how wide the door really was flung open.

I remember professors taking time out of their busy schedules to talk to me in Durland Hall. I remember the students we passed smiling and saying hello to us young high school students.

I remember the campus tour.

I met Patrick Broxterman in Anderson Hall. Most of the high school students had already left, and being Friday, most of the college students had, too.

I was the only person who showed up to get a look around, and, once we had donned our Goretex jackets and gloves, Patrick was happy to show me and my stepfather the campus. We walked past the library. We walked past Willard Hall. We walked through building after building, and when we were done, Patrick popped the question: "Where do you want to go now?"

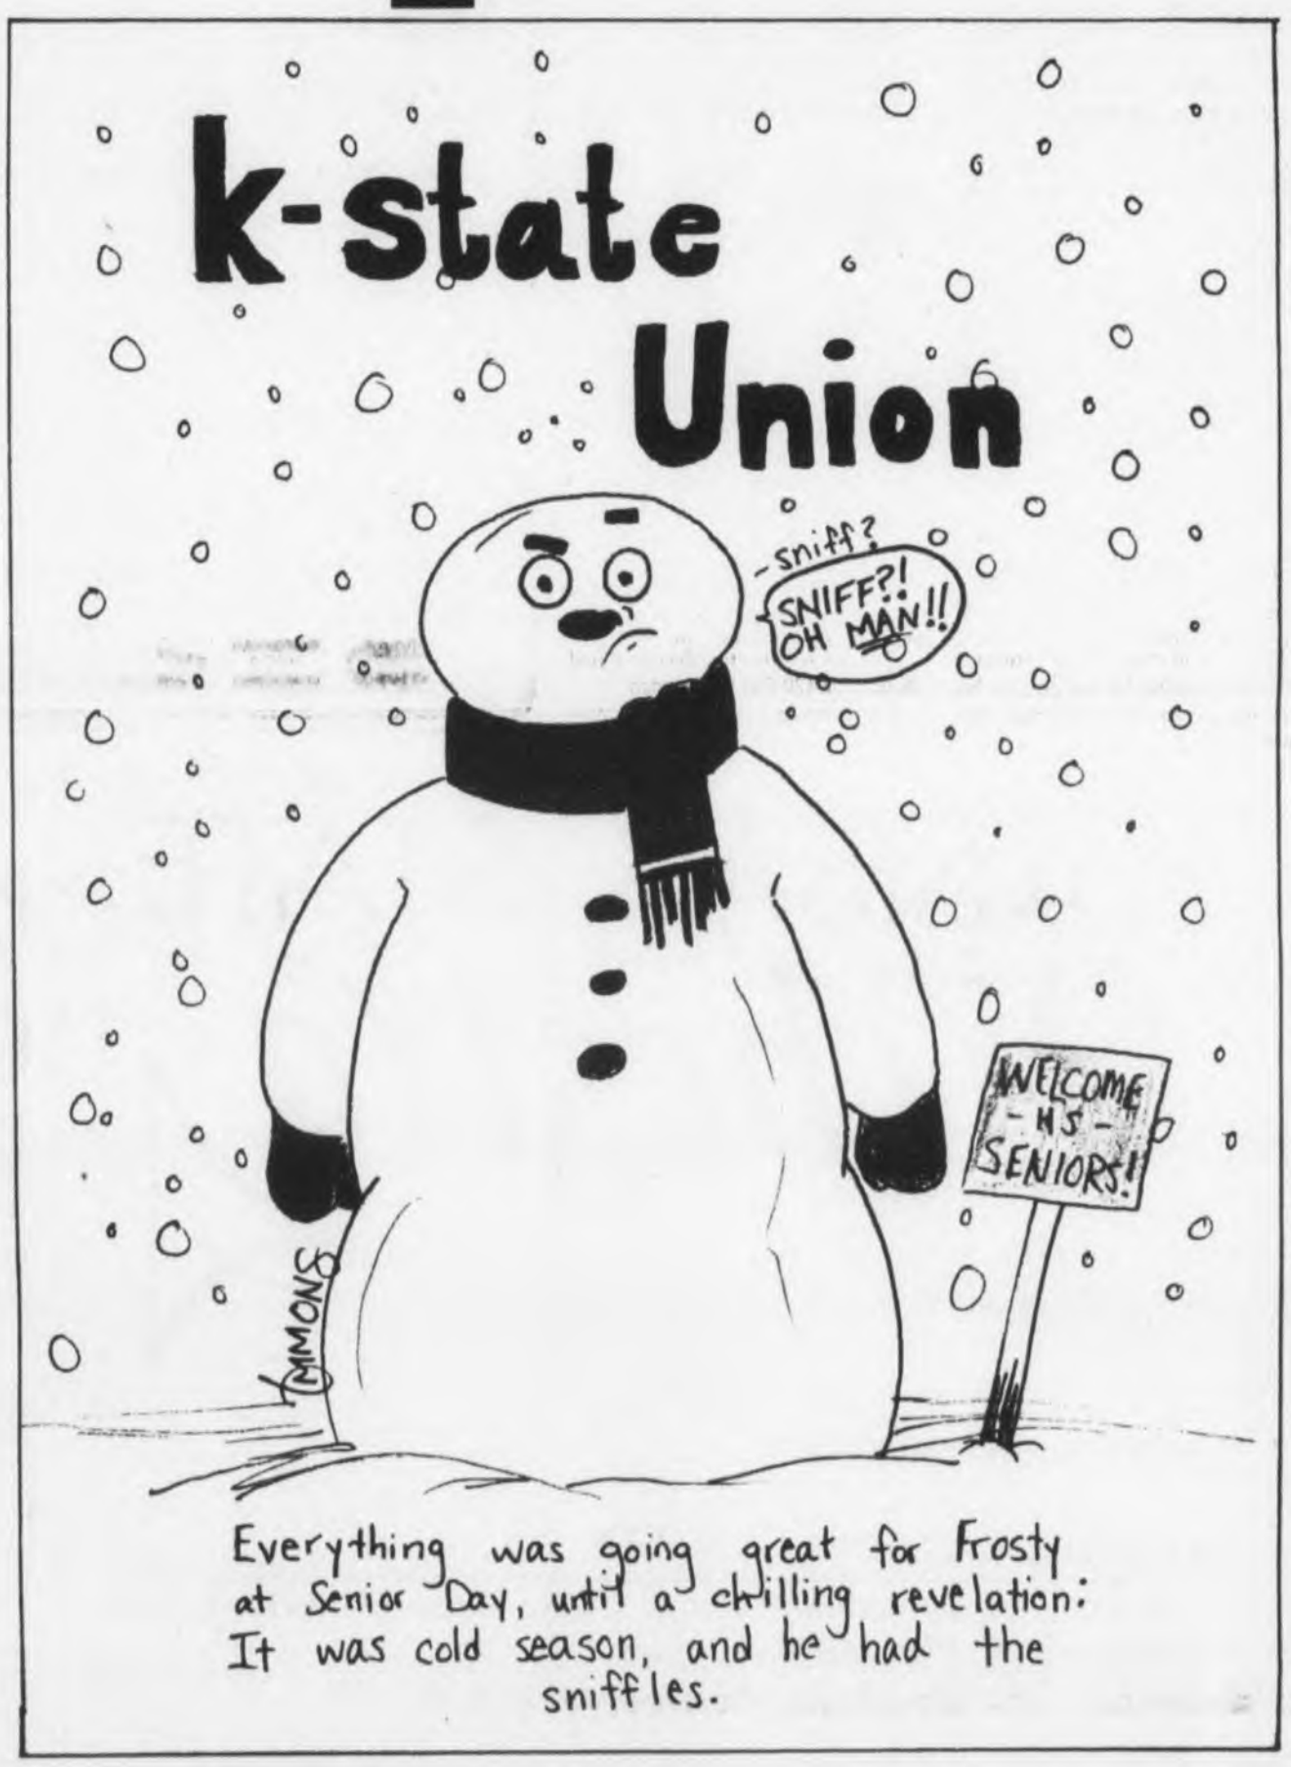
I had a vested interest in student government in high school.

"How about we go see Student Senate," I asked. It was all right with Patrick, although he had never really been in the Office of Student Activities and Services. Patrick showed me around, he introduced me to several senators and we all talked. Then Patrick and I paid Chris Hansen, former student body president, a visit.

You'll pardon me if I was slightly awestruck, but I was a high school student, and Chris, a man elected by his peers to be their leader, was taking time to talk to me. For half an hour we talked on that gray day, and up until I made my visit, I wasn't planning on being anywhere near Manhattan for school.

That opinion was changing. Here I found something I hadn't experienced at any other school. Not at Harvard, not at MIT, not at the University of Michigan and not at that other Kansas school was there anything remotely like this.

We left the Union.



"Where to next?" Patrick asked. I thought I might write for the Collegian some day, so I asked to visit. Although he had never been to the Collegian either, we went, and both of us got a tour of the facility from Kimberly Hefling, who was news editor at the time. She, too, probably had better things to do, but she walked us through all of Kedzie Hall.

So much attention. By the end of the day, I was sold. I went home and applied immediately. No other campus was this open. It was and continues to be a truly unique aspect.

It's only the beginning.

That was one of Patrick's best tours, and he sent me a letter several weeks later. At the bottom, written in violet ink, were the words: "Think purple."

I continue to do so.

Welcome to my family

We couldn't wait for the weekend

VIEWPOINT

MARY RENEE SMITH

MARY RENEE SMITH is a sophomore in speech. You can send e-mail to Mary at mojo@ksu.edu.

It's almost Family Weekend, and my family is getting dressed up for the occasion.

You are going to see quite a bit of my family this week. We have taken out ads and put up fliers. We are sponsoring speakers and panel discussions. We bought T-shirts. We are having a gala and showing a movie. There's even a pancake feed.

We are queers, and this is our week, too. I know the word queer is offensive to some, but it is really the only term I can think of that is inclusive of the entire family. Bisexuals, gays, lesbians, transgendered people, transvestites and many other smaller divisions make up the family but to try to list them I would surely forget someone.

Queer is our family name. Kind of like Smith, Clinton or Windsor.

This week is Coming Out Week. It leads up to Coming Out Day on Saturday. I see it as a happy cowinkydink that this week coincides with Family Weekend. While most of you are getting ready to show your family the campus, we are going to show the campus our family.

We are just like any other family. We fight among ourselves. We don't always like each other. Through everything, we try to respect and love one another. We have history that binds us.

Your family has a history. Maybe your grandparents immigrated here from a foreign land. Perhaps they endured persecution by oppressive governments.

Many in my family are pioneers in different ways such as comedian Ellen DeGeneres and Congressman Barney Frank. Homosexuals were among those in the Nazi concentration camps and continue to be victimized by governments and individuals.

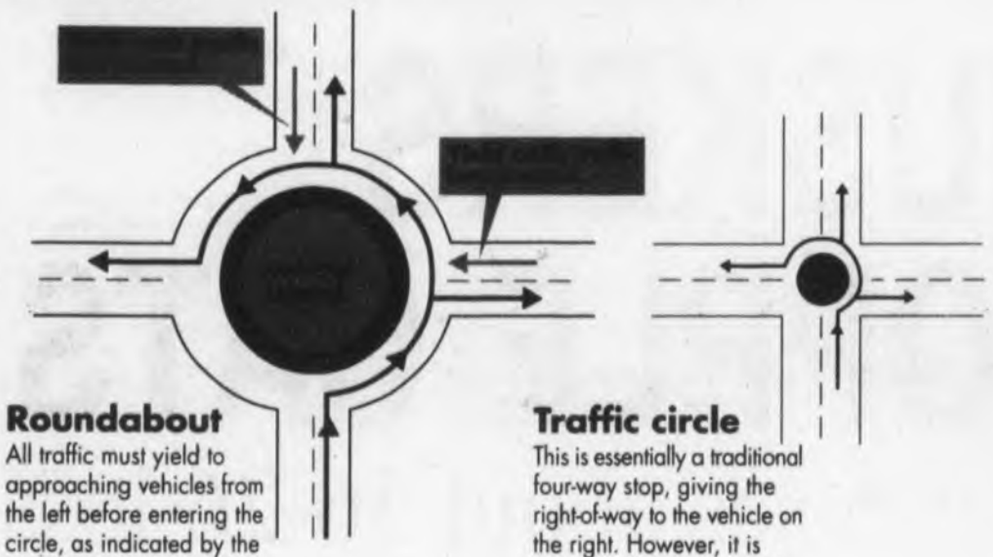
This is also Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week. Again, a happy twist of fate. Queers are not technically a race or an ethnicity. But queers and many races and ethnicities have much in common.

A strange byproduct of surviving persecution is humor and joy. Most cultures who have survived discrimination know how to enjoy the freedoms they have earned after years of violence, oppression and insults. Christians, Jews, blacks, Asians, American Indians and so many others have turned to music, art and humor to fight their pain, show their individuality and express joy. Queers are some of the most loving, fun and expressive people on the earth. But you already knew that.

Every family has its share of black sheep, and my family is no exception to that rule. Every family has some members they don't talk about in public. There are things you can say to and about your family that you can't say anywhere else. Every family has stories they would rather keep to themselves. Every family gossips about one another.

Every family has traditions that are particular to them — whether you open presents on Christmas Eve or Christmas morning, or whether your family has actual cranberries or that Jello-type stuff that comes out of a can with Thanksgiving dinner.

Queers have traditions, too. We have celebrations like Coming Out Day. There is language and terminology particular to the gay community. We identify with particular symbols such as rainbows and pink triangles. There are challenges unique to our family that only we can fully understand.



Not very often does a family invite you in to share in their experiences and get an inside look at life as one of them. This week is your chance to get a peek at my family. Come hear a speaker. Come see the movie "Stonewall." Take a minute to talk to someone who is queer.

We give lip service to diversity on this campus. Make a difference and do something.

Besides how often do you get the opportunity to see drag queens in the Union? (Thursday night at 6 for those of you who are wondering.)

Roundabout
All traffic must yield to approaching vehicles from the left before entering the circle, as indicated by the gray lines. To make a left turn, you must go around the circle.

Traffic circle
This is essentially a traditional four-way stop, giving the right-of-way to the vehicle on the right. However, it is necessary to go around the circle to turn left.

Committee opposes traffic structure; Student Senate to vote on resolution

LANCE SHOEN
staff reporter

A resolution objecting to the proposed traffic roundabout at the intersection of North Manhattan Avenue and Claflin Road, within blocks of the Derby Complex, Smurthwaite, Clovia and five greek houses, was finalized during the Governmental Relations Committee meeting Sunday.

The roundabout could be hazardous to students crossing the road during heavy traffic, committee members said.

"It is estimated that 20 to 25 percent of the campus population lives near this intersection," Patrick Carney, committee chair, said.

The resolution is scheduled to be voted on by Student Senate Thursday.

The roundabout is projected to cost about $250,000. Ninety percent of the money will come from the Kansas Department of Transportation, and 10 percent will be funded by the city of Manhattan.

The proposed roundabout will only be one lane which could cause problems during heavy traffic, Carney said. In most kinds of roundabouts, there is an inside lane for traffic which is already in the circle and an outer lane for outside traffic to merge into.

The rerouting of traffic through campus streets could make the intersection more congested and dangerous to pedestrians, according to the resolution. This could be especially dangerous during high traffic days such as football gamedays and moving days for the residence halls and other living organizations in that part of town.

The steepness of the hill to the north of the intersection could also become slippery during times of inclement weather, making it difficult to slow down, according to the resolution.

"The geography just won't allow it," Carney said.

The committee also discussed the future plans for Manhattan Avenue as a whole.

After the Anderson Avenue expansion construction is completed, it will be proposed that Manhattan Avenue be turned into a two-lane thoroughfare. The speed limit would be lowered to 20 mph and a small median would be placed in the middle of the street. There would also be two large bike lanes, one on each side of the street, Carney said.

City plans device to reduce accidents

KRISTIN BOYD
staff reporter

The city is working to solve area traffic problems at the intersection of Manhattan Avenue and Claflin Road.

The city's proposal is to put a roundabout, a traffic control device, in the middle of the intersection.

"A roundabout reduces the number of conflicts at an intersection by about 400 percent. It will provide better movement of traffic and will make the area safer," Jerry Petty, director of public works, said.

The intersection has been identified by the Kansas Department of Transportation as an ideal location for a roundabout because of the number of accidents that have occurred there.

"This area ranks high because of a significant accident history," said Jack Messer, city engineer for the city of Manhattan.

The Federal Government Surface Transportation Program will fund 90 percent of the construction for the new roundabout. The other 10 percent will be paid by the city.

Messer said there is an estimated $400,000 available for the project, but there have been no engineering estimates made.

The proposed roundabout will make the intersection circular. The driver will be guided into the roundabout, travel in a circle and then exit in the direction he or she wants to, Messer said.

The roundabout will affect several area residents.

Theresa Foster, freshman in business administration, lives at the Alpha of Clovia sorority house, next to the proposed roundabout.

"I think that it will be kind of a pain. If it will help with the traffic situation any, then let them do what they will," she said.

Although there are numerous traffic circles throughout Manhattan, there is only one other roundabout. Roundabouts are different in that they are larger, have a different structure produce a different traffic flow.

The current roundabout is located between the intersection of Candlewood and Gerry. This roundabout has a diameter of 84 feet.

"The roundabout we are proposing will be built like this one, but will be larger in scale," Messer said.

The city is estimating the new roundabout to be 120 feet in diameter.

Construction will begin in summer 1999.

CHIEFS DROP TO DOLPHINS

MIAMI — With the Miami Dolphins' season in danger of slipping away, their defense dug in against the Kansas City Chiefs.

Kansas City failed to score in the final 34 minutes, and Olindo Mare kicked a 26-yard field goal with 5:40 left for the only points in the second half, lifting Miami to a 17-14 victory Sunday.

The win could prove pivotal to the young Dolphins (3-2), who bounced back from consecutive losses to Green Bay and Tampa Bay. It was the 300th victory in Dolphins' history, improving their record to 300-196-4 since joining the AFL as an expansion team in 1966.

"This was a big one, not just in terms of our record, but also in terms of our morale," cornerback Terrell Buckley said.

Kansas City (4-2) lost its sixth consecutive game in Miami since 1990.

YOUNG WITH CLIPPERS

Mark Young, former K-State basketball player and Baton Rouge native, signed a one-year contract Wednesday to play with the Los Angeles Clippers. Young played with the Clippers in the L.A. summer league. They were so impressed with him the Clippers invited him back to Veterans Camp.

"I am happy for the chance to play for such an outstanding organization," Young said. Young was an Honorable Mention All-Big 12 player last year and Defensive Player of the Year for the 1995-96 season.

BIG 12 WEEKEND

The Texas Aggies are rising and the Texas Longhorns are falling in the Big 12.

The defending champion Longhorns carried the Big 12 banner into the regular season only to be embarrassed at every turn, most recently in Saturday's 42-16 loss to Oklahoma State (5-0, 2-0 in Big 12 games), a team they beat 71-14 last year.

The Aggies (4-0, 1-0), meanwhile, started the season in uncertainty with dual quarterbacks and coming off a 6-6 season.

Yet, here they are, back on top once again, as their trademark Wrecking Crew defense did a number on Colorado on Saturday in a 16-10 victory that kept the Aggies unbeaten in the Big 12 south.

Linebacker Dat Nguyen raved about the defense, which helped the Aggies jump from No. 21 to No. 16 in the AP Poll.

"We're just trying to bring back the tradition," Nguyen said. "It's big, huge. To beat the dominant team of the early 1990s and beat them at home is just phenomenal. We proved the Wrecking Crew is back."

Texas Tech (2-2, 1-0) didn't run very well but the Red Raiders had a good pass-catch combination between Zebbie Lethridge and Donnie Hart for a 35-14 victory over the Baylor Bears.

Kansas beat Oklahoma 20-17 in the 95th meeting of the two schools. It is the longest continually played rivalry in Division I-A.

The Longhorns (2-2, 0-1) got over their 66-3 loss to UCLA in their second game of the season to squeeze past Rice 38-31 last week. But they were back in the loser's column against the vengeful Cowboys.

It was only the second time since 1922 that the Longhorns had crossed the Red River to play in Oklahoma — and it wasn't a good time to return.

"We're kind of down right now," Texas linebacker Dusty Renfro said. "You're down after a loss. There's not a man on this earth who wouldn't be down after something like this."

The Cowboys are off to their best start ever, and they're 2-0 in conference play for the first time since 1972. That should make them contenders, Coach Bob Simmons said.

"Until somebody knocks us off, I like our chances," Simmons said.

The Red Raiders couldn't mount a running game against Baylor, but Lethridge and Hart made certain that didn't matter. Hart caught 11 passes for 181 yards and two touchdowns, and Lethridge completed 17 of 28 passes for 243 yards.

"Donnie had a great game plan as usual," Lethridge said. "He did a great job of getting open and once he caught the ball, he made some big plays. He helped us get off on the right foot in the conference race. It has been a long time since we came here and had a big game."

In other games involving Big 12 north teams, No. 21 Texas A&M defeated No. 16 Colorado in Boulder and Missouri defeated Iowa State 45-21.

Wildcats offer no excuses about 56-26 loss

SUN DEE MILLS

LINCOLN, Neb. — New year. Same result. A 56-26 win for Nebraska.

But no excuses.

"They were that much better than we were tonight," Coach Bill Snyder said. "I've played them for the last nine years, and I've been up here five of the nine. It hasn't been any different."

K-State's 29th loss to the Cornhuskers on Saturday night began with offensive Husker domination of the ball. Like Gen. Sherman marching through Georgia to the sea, the Huskers marched uncontested down the field on the first series and ran the ball 80 yards for a touchdown.

Husker I-back Ahman Green and quarterback Scott Frost rushed the majority of the drive, topped off by Green's 25-yard run for the touchdown.

Green's 20 rushes for 193 yards marked the 11th time in his career he rushed more than 100 yards in a game. Husker coach Tom Osborne said he expected nothing less from Green.

"He played very well," Osborne said. "Once he gets going, he is very hard to catch."

Cat defensive back Lamar Chapman was injured on the point-after attempt. Snyder said the Husker tight end from the far side came across the line of scrimmage and blocked Chapman, but he didn't know the extent of the injury. Chapman reappeared on the next defensive drive, but wide receiver David Allen returned punts for the rest of the game.

The Cats answered on the next drive with a touchdown of their own. Quarterback Michael Bishop's first two rushing attempts put the Cats into third-and-15, but Bishop completed a 19-yard pass to wideout Everett Burnett to gain the first down.

A 46-yard pass completed to Burnett put the Cats on the Huskers' 1-yard line, and Cat running back Eric Hickson dived over the pile of players into the end zone for the touchdown.

> K-State head coach

Hickson, a senior, was disappointed he didn't get to beat the Huskers during his career at K-State.

"You always want to beat the best team, and today we didn't," Hickson said. "It was all about execution. We didn't execute, and bad things happen when you don't execute."

Bad things began on the Cats' point-after attempt. The snap was muffed, and holder James Garcia couldn't get control of the ball.

Kicker Martin Gramatica never got a chance to kick because he was flattened by a Husker defender. Garcia's attempt to pick up the ball and run failed, and for the third time in four years of the series, the Cats failed at their first extra-point attempt.

The Huskers couldn't move the ball on their next drive, and the Cats had an opportunity to get the ball back. But on the punt return, the Cats were penalized 16 yards for roughing the kicker and the Huskers got a first down.

This penalty gave the Huskers momentum, and Frost attempted a 4-yard touchdown run to end the 66-yard drive and the first quarter. Unable to convert, the Huskers settled for a field goal.

Frost was the team's second-leading rusher with 111 yards, and he attributed his success to the Husker offensive line.

"They just keep getting better," Frost said. "The confidence is great. They're blowing people off the ball and making big holes. I think the key is that there are five guys in there who are fifth-year seniors or seniors."

The second quarter began the Cats' downslide. The Cats didn't get a first down in the first series, and they recorded their first tackle for a loss when linebacker Mark Simoneau knocked Green back two yards in the Huskers' first series.

On the Cats' next drive, Bishop threw his first interception of his Division I-A career. The pass, intended for Burnett, was broken up by rover Mike Brown. Husker free safety Eric Warfield recovered the bauble and returned the ball 26 yards to the K-State 14-yard line.

Cat defense only allowed the Huskers another field goal on the interception. But on the Cats' next possession, the team

Bishop loses 1st game in 2 years, vows to bounce back

JESS C. LOUK
staff writer

The last time Michael Bishop lost a football game he was a senior in high school.

Since entering college, Bishop seemed to be doing just fine. He went undefeated at Blinn Community College, in the process capturing two national championships.

As a Division I-A quarterback for K-State, Bishop was 3-0.

Then he met the Nebraska Cornhuskers. The same Cornhuskers that have dominated Bishop's new team for the past 29 games.

The trend continued Saturday. Bishop and the rest of the Cats' offense were manhandled in the Huskers' 56-26 win Saturday night. And even with a former undefeated quarterback, the Cats were still no better off against the Huskers.

"That was the first time I have seen a defense with that kind of quickness," Bishop said. "They have a great defense. They ran hard from the time I got the snap to the time the play ended."

With Nebraska's defense swarming all around him, Bishop was only able to complete 8 of 24 passes for 162 yards. Throughout the night, Bishop constantly found either a Husker in his face, someone knocking him down or a defender forcing him to try to tuck the ball and run with it.

When the Cats' offensive line gave Bishop time to throw the ball, he was inconsistent. On the Cats' first drive of the game, Bishop hit Everett Burnett between his numbers for big gains, on passes of 19 and 46 yards.

After those first two passes, Bishop wasn't able to complete a pass to anybody, except for a Nebraska defender in the second quarter. On Bishop's interception, he threw to a well-covered receiver and was able to hit him in the hands. The pass was then forced from the receiver's hands by the cornerback and picked off by Husker free safety Eric Warfield.

Civil rights commissioner outlines goals

▸ BUTLER EXPLAINS TRIUMPHS, SHORTCOMINGS in history of race relations in Kansas, calls for more improvements.

MATT KREPS
staff writer

Kansas civil rights have come a long way, but James Butler, commissioner for the Kansas Commission on Civil Rights, said there is still more work to be done.

Butler said awareness, education and enforcement are important parts in making civil rights work.

His speech, "The Civil Rights Movement in Kansas," included topics on national and state advances and called for more improvements.

Butler began his speech by telling about recent positive and negative events in race relations. For positives, he spoke of minority-owned companies with profits of more than $100 million and more than 8,000 minority members in public office including positions as mayors of large cities such as Kansas City, Mo., and Denver. Butler also reported growing numbers of minority students succeeding in school.

> "And so we go forward with hope, knowing that somewhere beyond race, somewhere beyond color, beyond religion is a virtue known as character."
> • James Butler
> commisioner for Kansas Commision of Civil Rights

"More minorities, according to our recent numbers, are attending graduate schools," Butler said. "One can say the political and educational outlook is positive for minorities."

But he also highlighted negative events such as church burnings, large numbers of hate groups across the country and a black marine who was set on fire and beheaded at a July 24 party in his Virginia hometown.

Butler's history of the civil rights movement documented clauses in the Magna Carta, the 13th Amendment and a series of court cases involving equal opportunity and integration.

Butler also included the Declaration of Independence on his list. He said the colonists cited 23 instances of civil rights abuses.

CLIF PALMBERG/Collegian

JAMES BUTLER, member of the Kansas Commission on Civil Rights, speaks Sunday evening in the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art. Butler talked to the audience about the history of human rights in Kansas.

"Of course separation came, and then war. And why? Civil rights, civil rights," he said.

Kansas' civil rights history has just as many examples, he said. Kansas was an important part in the history of civil rights from its creation, Butler said. The Kansas-Nebraska Act of 1854 created the state, but did not declare it slave or free.

"Kansas then became the meeting ground and, in some instance the battleground, for some settlers from Missouri and other southern states. The question was should Kansas enter the Union as a free or slave state," he said.

Kansas prohibited discrimination in public places in 1854 and created laws against employment and housing discrimination soon after. But it was not until complaints in 1952 about employment discrimination in state jobs that these laws were enforced, Butler said.

A commission investigated the complaints and found them to be true. The Kansas Commission on Civil Rights was formed to handle these complaints.

"I used to say when we had the 55 mph speed limit that speed kills. But they sped on. But when you see the lights, people slow down. It's called enforcement. We know, of course, that equal opportunity is the core of democracy," he said.

The commission verifies complaints and helps individuals document the instances. It then acts as an arbitrator to try to resolve the issue privately between the two parties. If negotiations do not work, an investigation is launched and the problem goes to other venues.

"We try to explain to both parties we would like to settle without a public hearing, but if they can not agree, then they are having a public hearing," Butler said.

Butler concluded his speech with a look to a better future.

"And so we go forward with hope, knowing that somewhere beyond race, somewhere beyond color, beyond religion is a virtue known as character."

Protesters gather near site to blast nuclear spacecraft

ASSOCIATED PRESS

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — Anti-nuclear activists holding signs reading "Cancel Cassini" and "It's crazy to destroy your own home" protested Saturday outside the Air Force station where a plutonium-powered spacecraft will be launched next week.

"I want them to just stop. They should just stop the nuclear debacle," said Beverly Red, who stood along the road leading into the station and held a sign reading "Plutonium Kills." She flew in from Vermont for the demonstration.

Beside her stood Jim Ream, a NASA engineer who also opposes the space agency's Oct. 13 launch of Cassini to Saturn. "Any chance of a potential nuclear problem here in my community is one chance too many," said Ream, whose sign read "Honk! If you care!"

The afternoon demonstration, by coincidence, took place one day after the White House approved the launch of Cassini. Because of the highly radioactive plutonium, NASA needed clearance from the very top before proceeding with its $3.4 billion mission to study Saturn, its rings and moons.

"Their making their approval yesterday is very clearly intended to try to blunt the reaction from these protests, and we take it as a compliment," said Bruce Gagnon, coordinator of the Florida Coalition for Peace and Justice who organized Saturday's protest. "It's just going to make people more determined than ever."

Cassini will be powered by 72 pounds of plutonium, the most ever rocketed into space. It will take seven years for the spacecraft to reach Saturn, so far from the sun that solar panels as currently designed could not produce electricity for the many instruments.

"My contention is that Saturn's not going to go anywhere," Ream said. "Why don't we wait 10 years, 20 years, 30, whatever. That scientific information will be there at such time that we develop other than nuclear means of powering a spacecraft."

By early afternoon, more than 300 people had gathered in near 90-degree heat about a half-mile from the main entrance of Cape Canaveral Air Station. Some promised to try to climb over the station's 8-foot chain-link fence, topped with barbed wire. The Air Force warned any trespassers would be arrested.

Cassini and its rocket, an unmanned Titan 4-B, were located several miles from this entrance and surrounded by more fences, more surveillance cameras and more armed guards.

The National Aeronautics and Space Administration and the Energy Department insist the mission is safe because of all the shielding around the plutonium. In the event of a launch accident and release of plutonium, the government says, any radiation exposure would be minute.

Opponents, however, claim a rocket explosion could shower toxic plutonium over the entire area and that an accident during a 1999 fly-by of Earth would be even deadlier if plutonium is released into the atmosphere.

Former governor stresses importance of leadership in university experience

BRANDI HERTIG
staff reporter

Using words such as "cultivation" in his speech, former governor and 1966 K-State graduate Michael Hayden could have been talking about farming.

But he wasn't. He was discussing the cultivation of leadership skills in college students.

Hayden presented his speech, "The Campus Experience as a Foundation for Lifetime Leadership" on Friday as part of the Legacy Lecture Series. Hayden stressed the importance of acquiring leadership skills as part of the university experience.

"Leadership is a critically, critically important thing," Hayden said. "It's a thing few people naturally possess. Most develop those attributes through very hard work."

Hayden said that during his time at K-State, almost the only opportunity to develop leadership skills was to join the ROTC.

"Certainly not much of my opportunities in leadership can be traced to my experiences at K-State," he said. "I've always felt that was kind of a missing link.

"Times have changed here on campus — and certainly for the better."

Hayden said leadership is an attribute that is cross-cutting through all types of careers.

"It isn't just in politics. It isn't just in public policy," he said. "The truth is, it's in every community. It's in every successful operation."

Vision, which Hayden described as being able to see where others can't see, is a fundamental element in the making of a leader.

Hayden cited computer mogul Bill Gates as an example of a successful combination of leadership and vision.

It's no secret why Bill Gates is the richest man in America, Hayden said. Gates sees things we can't see, and he has the leadership to act upon those things.

Vision, which Hayden said is important in decision-making, is based on one's own experiences.

"And if you haven't had a broad-based experience, you can only expect that decision you make to be based on a narrow set of premises," he said.

During the next several years, Hayden said he will be working on installing a leadership institute at K-State, designed especially to teach students the leadership skills needed to be competent in the world.

"If we are going to reach out to the challenges that face this world, some of our students have got to have exposure to leadership training to successfully rise to the top in this very, very competitive environment of ours," he said.

Search for missing Navy pilot suspended

ASSOCIATED PRESS

VIRGINIA BEACH, Va. — A search was suspended Friday for a missing Navy pilot who ejected from an F-14 fighter with a crew member before his jet crashed into the Atlantic Ocean.

"They have searched all of the area that is possible for anything to be in with negative results," Navy spokesman Mike Maus said.

Lt. Cmdr. Logan A. Allen III, 33, of Virginia Beach, disappeared after he and a crew member ejected Thursday afternoon during a training exercise about 50 miles off the North Carolina coast.

The crew member, Cmdr. Craig A. Roll, 39, of Virginia Beach, was rescued uninjured within an hour.

Although pilots said they saw two open parachutes descending to the sea, Allen could not be found despite an intense search that included several ships and aircraft.

Navy aviators receive extensive water-survival instruction, including learning to get out of a parachute, keeping afloat for long periods and making fresh water out of salt water, Maus said.

Their flight gear includes a life vest that inflates when it hits the water, an emergency radio and a beacon. Maus did not know whether rescue crews had received a radio transmission from the pilot.

The cause of the crash has not been determined. The plane is based at the Oceana Naval Air Station.

It was the first significant accident involving a military plane since six crashed during a seven-day span in mid-September. Those accidents prompted the Pentagon to order a one-day grounding of training flights for safety reviews by all the services.

LOOKINGback

1981 - Once again, an act of violence put Middle East peace on a tightrope as Nobel Peace Prize-winner Anwar el-Sadat, the President of Egypt, was assassinated this day. Sadat was reviewing a military parade when the attack by Islamic fundamentalists occurred.

1991 - Elizabeth Taylor was married for the eighth time — to construction worker, Larry Fortensky. The wedding took place at Michael Jackson's estate in California amidst a flurry of paparazzi.

1st Flint Hills Literary Festival celebrates Kansas poet, writer

▸ SON SHARES MEMORIES with audience.

The first Flint Hills Literary Festival attracted a small crowd to honor the memory of Kansas poet and writer William Stafford with a keynote address presented by Stafford's son, Kim Stafford, Friday evening at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art.

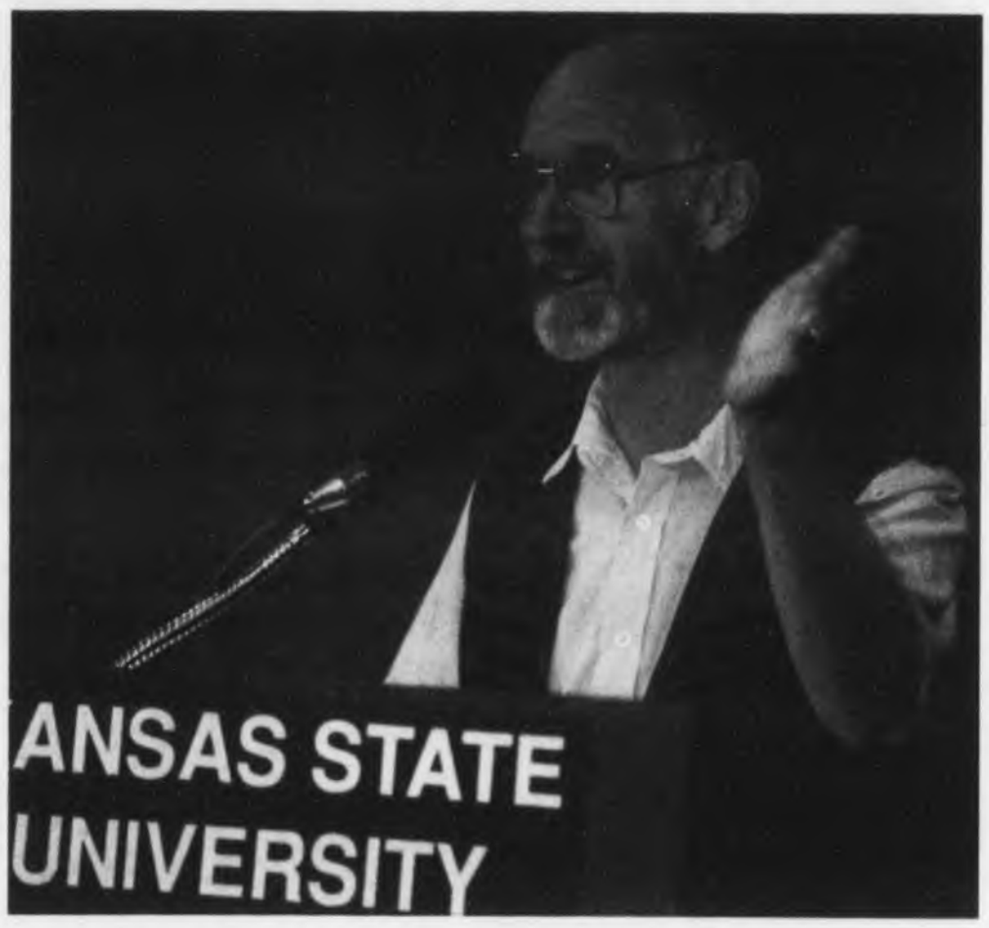
Kim Stafford, noted poet and nonfiction writer, reminisced about the Stafford household and William Stafford's work in the address, "Living With the Light and Darkness of William Stafford."

In May 1993, Kim Stafford became his father's literary executor. Now he is the keeper of 60 cartons of literary papers, all written works by his father.

"Tonight I want to read you some puzzling, moving, profound, curious, mysterious things from that archive," Kim Stafford said.

After William Stafford's death, Kim Stafford did not want to write or be his father's literary executor. But someone told him he had to write a piece, which he later titled "A Deeper Poem than Safety." He read that poem, describing only a small part of the relationship he shared with his father.

Kim Stafford read poems his father had written, as the audience sat profoundly still or laughed with the emotional changes expressed within William Stafford's works. "There is a Thread You Follow" was one of the poems Kim Stafford read.



"I think one of my dad's threads is his thread to Kansas," Kim Stafford said. "The thread of Kansas where these simple words like wind, grass, thunder, sky — we love them don't we?"

Kim Stafford talked about his book of selected poems titled "The Way It Is," which is due out next spring. The book consists of hundreds of William Stafford's works.

"I don't want my daddy to be famous, but I think we all need his work to be known," he said.

Kim Stafford's essays, stories, poems and reviews have appeared in such places as The Atlantic, The New York Times Book Review and Western American Literature. His book, "Having Everything Right," has been on a Western States' book review.

Kim Stafford taught in art institutes at the University of California, Davis; Iowa State University; and Willamette University. He worked as an oral historian, letter-press printer, editor, photographer and teacher. He is the director of the Northwest Writing Institute at Lewis and Clark College.

Jonathan Holden, K-State poet in residence, recites one of William Stafford's poems Saturday evening in the Union Little Theatre. Holden also spoke about Stafford, whom some call the most important literary figure in Kansas history.

▸ FORUM FEATURES PANELS, WORKSHOPS, readings for 2nd half of festival.

Writers and scholars from across the nation discussed readings and recognized one of America's most important and accessible poets, William Stafford, in Saturday's first Flint Hills Literary Festival.

This year's festival celebrated "The Life and Writing of William Stafford," a Kansas native and literary figure. In remembrance of William Stafford, his son, Kim Stafford delivered a keynote address Friday evening at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art.

On Saturday, a number of readings and presentations were presented in the K-State Student Union, including a panel of student writers from Wichita State University.

Among Saturday morning's presentations was a talk by State Street Press editor Judith Kitchen, titled "Dark and Deep: Robert Frost and William Stafford."

Michigan State University professor Laura Apol followed with "Why Stafford? Why Children? Why Poems?"

Wichita State's Richard Spilman ended the morning events with a fiction reading.

The afternoon and evening events began with a brief referred presentation on "The Life and Writing of William Stafford," by Alice Prince, a nature writer from Tulsa, Okla., who was Stafford's assistant in 1978.

"I just want to support this passion because I think it's very important," Prince said. "I think there will be more literary festivals, maybe at other universities, honoring poets and writers such as William Stafford."

"He was the most prolific writer," she said. "Stafford published over 200 poems in a year."

Other presentations were from Claude Liman, Denise Low, Stan Rubin, John Kaufman, Melissa Rodenbeek and Steven Hind.

A three-hour workshop conducted by Manhattan writer Charles Kempthorne on "Writing Personal and Family Histories," discussed the importance of writing family histories and how to remember the past.

Later in the evening, students from Wichita State read poetry and fiction.

"I'm a little familiar with Stafford," Davis said. "But we all came up here with our own styles of writing."

The night ended with a closing lecture and question-and-answer session with K-State poet in residence Jonathan Holden. He spoke of William Stafford's life and literary reputation.

"To end this celebration of Bill Stafford, let us savor again, in his own words, his wisdom," Holden said. Holden read several of Stafford's cuttings and works.

Kim Stafford joined in the question-and-answer session, answering audience questions.

"I have this reoccurring dream that my dad and I are going on a long drive," Kim Stafford said. "All this stuff I want to ask him — then I wake up. What I finally realized about this dream is that this is that drive. That drive is Kansas."

Writer sings heart out to raise money for charity

Music Review

By the time the Saturday night concert was over and singer-songwriter Pierce Pettis left the stage, a good time had been had by all.

Pettis, performing the second BirdHouse Productions concert this fall, played at St. Thomas More Catholic Church as a benefit to one of his favorite causes, Habitat for Humanity. Pettis' basic costs were covered by local First Savings Bank so the ticket sales could go to the Manhattan chapter of Habitat.

Although the dining hall where the concert took place makes one a little nostalgic for the spooky, attic-like feel of BirdHouse's usual stage back at the Manhattan Center for the Arts, the room was still certainly adequate. And once Pettis began, location was window dressing anyway.

The Alabama native played 20 songs, most from his newest compact disc, "Making Light of It." Pettis' style was characterized by a steady, reliable beat on the guitar and lyrics with a clarity, so one could hear the words without even trying. As always, if one doesn't like stories, between or within the songs, the BirdHouse series is to be avoided at all costs. Storytelling is the name of the game.

As steady as the beat was and as clear as the lyrics were, everything else could, and did, change drastically from one song to another. "Granddaddy Blew the Whistle" had a constant train-like tempo punctuated with sharp notes as surprisingly adequate "whistles." "Hold On to That Heart" on the other hand, was a slow tune with tragedy in the storyline. Of course, along came "If I Were You" which altered its own tempo to both extremes without a seam.

Pettis also worked his coordination skills into the show with a simultaneous guitar-harmonica combo for two numbers as well as occasionally displaying his prowess at drinking his coffee with one hand and continuously playing with the other.

"Learned this trick from a drunk ventriloquist," Pettis quipped to the audience.

As good as the music was, the charm behind BirdHouse remains its tendency for artist-audience rapport. One can't sit more than 100 feet away from Pettis, who always mentioned his co-writers before beginning a song and thanked the applauding crowd after finishing each one.

The audience members got a strong sense of Pettis as an artist from just the music. They also saw the friendly guy still a little worn around the edges from a long drive to Manhattan after performing the night before in Nebraska.

But it didn't affect the music. The only side effect was a somewhat absent-minded demeanor that only endeared him to the audience even more.

As he tuned his guitar for about two minutes between numbers, Pettis suddenly stopped, looked out at the audience and said, "Man, you guys are nice. If I were in a bar, guys would've killed me by now."

Put simply, Pettis liked the audience members, and they liked him. They made requests during intermission. He asked if anyone could tell him the score of the Florida State-Miami game between songs 16 and 17. It was an informal sort of symbiosis.

And despite being a benefit, one didn't get beaten into submission with the cause. Pettis briefly praised Habitat For Humanity, and after intermission, Baptist minister Jim Spencer recited his original poem "There Is More To Building A Home." The president of the Manhattan chapter explained the purpose and goals of Manhattan Habitat. Habitat's presence was brief and in good taste.

But apparently, the cause did well. Before the nigh ended, BirdHouse founder David Kamerer announced that the benefit had pulled in $775 from ticket sales alone. The final amount included $350 from First Savings Bank, $50 from Pettis' CD sales and $75 from concessions. The total amount came to $1,250.

Making contact with Pettis after the concert was not easy. Between the veritable hero-worship he receives from those well-versed in the folk-acoustic genre (even Don Conoscenti in the Sept. 9 BirdHouse concert referred to Pettis as "a god") and the general chaos of packing up stage equipment, he was surprisingly gracious to pestering reviewers.

The only frustrating thing about talking to the man is that getting him to talk about himself was akin to swimming through peanut butter. He readily spoke about his wife, Michele, a daughter, Grace, 9, and two sons George, 7, and Rayvon, 12.

Pettis said he commutes to Nashville, Tenn., two to three days a week for 12-hour days as a staff songwriter for Polygram Records, tries to tour on weekends and has just gotten his song "You Move Me" on Garth Brooks' most-recent album.

Other than that, Pettis was tireless about his praise for Habitat as an organization he considers to be "built of such a common-sense principle." Ironically, Pettis will fight to the last breath saying he does very little for the organization. One suspects that the local chapter, $775 closer to its fourth house in Manhattan, might beg to differ.

Regardless, Pettis praised Habitat as being "absolutely above reproach" for building homes for needy people, along with the applicants' and volunteers' help, then arranging for no-interest mortgages so the applicants can own the home in 20 years.

Unlike the charities Pettis said he'd gotten involved with in college — only to find them rather dubious later — he found Habitat to be "something that can appeal to everybody of all politics."

Pettis said his next concert was to be a standard gig in Moundridge, Kan., before he went home with the possibility of a New York tour this weekend.

Tall tale

City Park statue causes confusion about character's identity

SARA MARTIN
staff writer

Jerri Garretson, head children's librarian at Manhattan Public Library, clarifies some misconceptions about the nearly 30-foot statue in City Park, and contrary to popular belief, it's not Paul Bunyan.

"He was industrious and hardworking, generous and kind, thrifty and very much a Republican. He was literally larger than life not only in size, but in the things he did," Garretson said.

In actuality, that great big guy is Johnny Kaw, a tall-tale character created in 1955 to spark interest in Kansas history for the Manhattan centennial celebration.

Recently, Garretson published a children's book, telling the tales of this fictional man for the first time since George Filinger invented the character and wrote a book about him. She and Diane Dollar, assistant professor of art at K-State, wanted to re-create the legend and inform people that the mystery statue is not Paul Bunyan.

As a matter of fact, stories of Kaw prove that he is much better than his folklore rival. After Kaw had arrived in Kansas and planted all of the wheat in the state, Bunyan came to visit to see his new competition and trampled down much of the new crops. He became very angry, wrestled Bunyan to the ground and drug him all around Kansas, digging the Kaw River Valley with his nose.

Later, Kaw felt guilty and gave Bunyan his family's blue ox as a gift.

Statewide interest grew, not only from his conquering of Bunyan, but from his many other claims to fame. He was responsible for the carving of the pioneer trails. When he became impatient with the slowness of his family's oxen-drawn wagons, he took over the haul, and he dug in his heels so hard that they left the carvings of his wandering trail throughout the state.

Kaw also had a hand in the making of the Grand Canyon. In exchange for his hard work, he was allowed to bring all of the leftover dirt back to Kansas to spread around to make the ground fertile. Kaw then took all of the rocks and piled them up to make the Rocky Mountains.

After a day of hard work, a giant gets rather hungry, and Kaw felt that dandelions weren't nearly big enough to satisfy his appetite. He knew that sunlight made things grow, so he dipped the dandelions into a bottle of concentrated sunlight to create sunflowers.

Kaw even has a connection to K-State and the University of Kansas. While on some of his adventures, he came across a bedraggled hawk that he named Jay and a baby bobcat. These two pets got along most of the time, but their fights could get pretty big. As a result of these fights, the Dust Bowl was created.

Many of these sorts of stories appealed to all ages in the 1950s, and a Johnny Kaw Booster Club was created. From private donations, it helped to raise the $7,000 needed to build the steel and concrete statue in 1966. Its intention was to maintain Kaw as a Kansas legend and to be a tourist attraction. However, nothing was ever made to inform visitors who the statue was, causing the legend to die away.

Garretson hopes to resurrect the tales of Kaw and bring him to life. She wants children to understand Kansas history with a fun character, and to know what kind of man Kaw was.

According to her book, "He was a big man in a big land, a hard-working pioneer, and don't you forget it."

"HE WAS LITERALLY LARGER THAN LIFE."

Astronaut's homecoming from space station delayed by weather

ASSOCIATED PRESS

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — After 144 days away from his family and planet, astronaut Michael Foale had to wait a little longer Sunday to return from Mir aboard space shuttle Atlantis.

Although the weather was good enough for an unmanned rocket to blast off with a communication satellite, the wind was too gusty and the clouds were too thick for Atlantis to land safely. NASA ordered the seven-member shuttle crew to stay up an extra orbit and try for a touchdown later in the evening.

Foale couldn't wait to see his wife and two young children and to dig into some pizza and pasta. Also on his wish list: beer and chocolate.

"Ian hasn't been crying for Daddy because he can see my excitement, and he knows he's coming home," Rhonda Foale said of their 3-year-old son.

Foale's 4-1/2 months aboard Russia's aging space station were often trying and sometimes downright scary.

A cargo ship similar to the one launched to Mir from Kazakstan on Sunday plowed into the station in June, one month after Foale arrived.

The 40-year-old astrophysicist — whose mission is exceeded on the U.S. side only by Shannon Lucid's 188-day Mir tour in 1996 — lost half his science experiments and almost all his personal belongings in the crash. As a result, he's coming home pretty much empty-handed. The charms he took up for his wife and friends are sealed in the ruptured lab.

Frequent computer breakdowns also left Mir running on reduced power during Foale's visit. And a too-close-for-comfort satellite briefly forced him and his two Russian companions into their escape capsule in mid-September.

"When things get hard, they get easier a little bit later," the ever-cheerful Foale said Saturday. "It's best to take the long view and work hard, steadily, and not let anything affect you too much."

Because of Foale's increasingly close calls, some members of Congress and others had urged NASA to stop putting astronauts on the 11 1/2-year-old space station. But NASA Administrator Daniel Goldin discounted the objections and, just one day before Atlantis' Sept. 25 liftoff, cleared Foale's successor, David Wolf, for a four-month stay.

could only move the ball to the K-State 31-yard line. That would be the farthest the Cats would move the ball that quarter.

The Huskers scored another touchdown with 4:33 left in the second quarter, putting the score at 20-6. Defensive back Cephus Scott got the first interception of his career on a Frost pass attempt, but the Cats couldn't move the ball.

Going into the locker room down by 14, Snyder said he knew the Cats still had a chance to get back in the game. But the third quarter was the beginning of the end.

"It was a series of things," Snyder said. "Our inability to move the ball in the third quarter, our kicking game fell apart, a couple of turnovers, and we got soft on defense for awhile."

All of that plus dropped passes, penalties and the Huskers offensive success put the Cats in a 41-6 hole going into the fourth quarter.

"That's what makes them good, they don't make mistakes," right tackle Ryan Young said. "They just capitalized on our mistakes."

Against the Huskers second-stringers, the Cats began lighting up the scoreboard.

But the Huskers did so as well, and the score reached its 56-26 mark with 49 seconds left in the game. Young said although the Huskers definitely outplayed the Cats, no one quit playing.

"I don't think anyone gave up," Young said. "We thought we could beat them this year."

Same hopes. Same result. But again, Snyder refused to offer excuses.

"I don't think the crowd noise bothered us," Snyder said. "I don't think it was the atmosphere. I think it was Nebraska. They just have a darn good football team."

safety Eric Warfield.

Bishop ended the half with two completions on seven attempts and one interception. Throughout the half, Bishop would hit his receivers in stride. On others, his passes would skip off the artificial turf, two feet in front of his intended target.

Even with these statistics, Coach Bill Snyder said his quarterback didn't play a poor game.

"For Michael, very average," Snyder said. "He competed until the last gun went off."

The 17 times Bishop tried to run the ball, he was only able to gain a total of 14 yards, which figures at 0.8 yards per carry. Although Bishop didn't put up big numbers and Snyder didn't think he provided a stellar performance, some Nebraska defenders were impressed with his play.

"He looked pretty mobile out there," defensive end Jason Peter said. "He is a great athlete who has a tremendous future. He can run as well as any quarterback we've seen this season, and we're just happy that we contained him as well as we did."

Now that Bishop has suffered his first collegiate loss, he isn't looking back. This Saturday, the Cats line up at home to take on the Missouri Tigers, and Bishop was already talking about the Tigers after the Nebraska game.

"I've just got to keep my head up and get ready for Missouri," Bishop said.

Hale

He then presented his campaign T-shirt to Hobrock as a token of appreciation.

"We'll be sure to put this in the archives," Hobrock said.

Jackie McClaskey, another former student body president, continued the promotion during her term in office. She described the library as a new pride for K-State.

"This building has created an additional pride in the former and present students of K-State who didn't think they could bleed any more purple," McClaskey said.

On behalf of present K-State students, Tim Riemann, student body president, spoke about the library's influence on the present-day campus. Riemann said the library will always stand as the cornerstone and foundation of K-State — to educate.

Following the voices of past and present students, Richard Morse, co-chairman of the Essential Edge Campaign for fund raising, explained how he was hesitant to begin such a difficult task but then accepted the challenge.

"I thought, 'What higher public service than to support the library?'" Morse said.

He said no single entity deserved all the credit for the library.

"It's obvious to all that this is a shared success," he said.

Hobrock credited Provost Jim Coffman with a role in the library's success. He said Coffman recognizes the university's needs. Its problems are often addressed using a collective approach.

"We've got a real history here at Kansas State University of the faculty, administration and students solving problems together," Coffman said.

Just as K-State solves problems together, it also celebrates its successes together. University administration, faculty members and student leaders, joined by Joyce Hale, unveiled the limestone sign inscribed with "Hale Library."

Smiles, applause and photographs followed the dedication of the $30 million project. Tours and refreshments completed the dedication ceremony.

▶ STUDENT PRIVILEGE FEES could increase if referendum receives 60 percent approval Nov. 11.

SARA BURDETTE
staff reporter

Next year, not only will students stand in line for hours to pick up their football tickets, they could also pay more for them.

At the Privilege Fee Committee meeting Monday, it was announced that the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics plans to expand KSU Stadium. The project will cost between $10 million and $12 million, Aaron Otto, committee chairman, said.

A new student fee could be introduced to pay for the expansion, Otto said, depending on the results of a referendum vote the Athletic Department hopes to conduct Nov. 11.

The referendum must be passed by 60 percent of students who vote before a new fee is considered by Student Senate.

"If 10 people show up and six people vote for it — merry Christmas," Aaron Truax, committee vice chair, said.

The referendum would consist of a question asking students if they support the expansion and would follow up with questions asking students how they would be willing to pay for them.

One option for payment could create a $12 yearly privilege fee funded over 15 years, Truax said. This option would increase the number of student seats from 7,500 to 9,000.

Another option could create a $24 yearly privilege fee funded over 15 years, which would increase the number of seats to 10,000.

Bret Glendening, committee member, said if Senate passes the fee, it will not be reviewed again because the expansion would be a bonded issue.

E.coli outbreak sickens at least 9 at high school

ASSOCIATED PRESS

PARKERSBURG, Iowa — Food contaminated by E. coli bacteria made at least nine students ill at Aplington-Parkersburg High School. Health officials were trying to determine if cafeteria meals were involved.

"It does not seem to be anything in the community, like a restaurant or a grocery store in the community. It does seem to be school-based," Kevin Teale, spokesman for the Iowa Department of Public Health, said Monday.

Students began falling ill on Sept. 28. At least nine students were ill with symptoms consistent with E. coli contamination, and three were hospitalized for dehydration caused by diarrhea. All three have subsequently been released.

Results of tests done on the initial cases confirmed Monday that E. coli was present, Teale said.

About 30 students were asked to fill out questionnaires listing what they ate from Sept. 22 to 26.

"There are literally dozens of items that could have caused that problem," Teale said. "Right now we're still looking at the surveys, still trying to get an accurate count of how many kids got sick."

He said the contamination did not necessarily come from the school cafeteria, and authorities were "checking to see if there was a pep rally or a party or something that the students attended."

E. coli bacteria, found in the digestive tract of animals, can be transmitted in meat or in other foods that have come in contact with it. Its most virulent strain causes diarrhea, cramps and dehydration and can be fatal to the very young, elderly and those with weak immune systems.

In recent weeks two Nebraska meatpackers have recalled some of their ground beef because of suspected E. coli contamination.

The latest recall was Friday, when nearly 444,000 pounds of ground beef from a BeefAmerica plant was pulled after investigators discovered E. coli in a random sample taken at a grocery store in Virginia.

"It's generally associated with ground beef, but in recent years there have been cases of it in fruit juices when fruit that went into the juice was picked up off the ground," Teale said.

HOW TO PREVENT E.COLI POISONING

The U.S. Department of Agriculture recommends cooking beef, poultry and fish to at least 160 degrees.

- Quickly freeze or refrigerate all perishable foods after shopping.
- Never thaw food on the counter or let it sit out of the refrigerator for more than two hours. This time is reduced to one hour if outdoor temperatures are higher than 85 degrees.
- Use refrigerated ground meat in one to two days. Use frozen meat in three to four months.
- Wash hands, utensils and work areas with hot soapy water after contact with raw meat to avoid cross-contamination. Follow good personal hygiene rules, especially after using the bathroom.
- Cook any dish made with ground meat until it's gray or brown inside, or until it reaches an internal temperature of 160 degrees.
- Serve food with clean plates and utensils.

Speech about sodomy law begins Coming Out Week

ZACH VADER
staff reporter

Max Movsovitz, a self-employed Topeka man, told his audience Monday how he was a victim of the Kansas and Topeka laws against sodomy. His presentation, sponsored by Bisexual, Gay and Lesbian Society, kicked off Coming Out Week at K-State.

▶ The editorial.
Learn why and how a few minutes of your day could turn into a learning experience that lasts a lifetime.

According to Kansas laws, sodomy is oral or anal copulation between people who are not husband and wife or consenting adults of the opposite sex, or between a person and an animal, or coitus with an animal.

Movsovitz was arrested for solicitation of sodomy in August 1995 in Gage Park in Topeka.

"I was approached by two different undercover police officers," he said. "The first one tried to get me to say something wrong for about a half hour."

Movsovitz said he was aware of the laws and was careful about what he said to the men.

"When the second man talked to me later, he asked if I was into it," he said. "I replied yes. Then he asked me what I liked and I told him. He asked if I would do that action to him and I said I would. That is when he arrested me."

The law says that the definition of "solicit" is to approach another person with an offer of sexual services.

Movsovitz thought he was not doing anything wrong because he was not soliciting sodomy. The police officer approached him, but Movsovitz was arrested for solicitation of sodomy.

Movsovitz said he has had overwhelming support from his friends, neighbors and family.

Movsovitz said the laws are unfair to homosexuals.

"The city law states that homosexuals can't talk about these actions in public," he said. "But for heterosexuals it is. That's not fair."

"We're not talking about fighting against sex in the park," he said. "We're fighting for being able to talk about sex between consensual adults, homosexual or heterosexual."

Student's death result of car-accident injuries

TRAVIS D. LENKNER

Susan Hallauer, 20, junior in elementary special education, died Monday morning at St. Francis Hospital and Medical Center, Topeka, as a result of injuries sustained in a Saturday morning car accident.

Hallauer, a native of Holton, Kan., was involved in a two-car accident at 12:30 a.m. Saturday at the intersection of U.S. Highway 75 and Jackson County Road 254. Hallauer was driving a 1980s-model Buick Sentry and was wearing her seat belt. She was three miles from her home.

Don Fallon, K-State's coordinator of religious activities, met with Hallauer's fellow residents on the second floor of West Hall on Monday night. Commenting before the meeting, Fallon said he was confident there would be a campus memorial service.

"I'm quite sure there will be a memorial service," he said. "Right now, the question is when the funeral will be. We have heard that it may be held on Thursday, which would mean that we would wait to have a memorial service until Friday or Monday."

Fallon said details about a memorial service would be announced later in the week. Plans for Hallauer's funeral in Holton had not been announced at press time.

A 1995 graduate of Jackson Heights High School, Hallauer was employed as a student assistant in the College of Architecture, Planning and Design technical support center. Fallon said she was also a member of Christian Challenge, a Baptist campus ministry and Fellowship of Christian Athletes.

She is survived by parents Roy and Kay Hallauer of Holton, and two K-State siblings, a sister, Anita, senior in pre-physical therapy, and a brother, David, a 1996 graduate in animal sciences and industry.

More details about the accident were not available. A Jackson County Sheriff Department spokesman said the accident was still under investigation.

"THE MOVE WAS QUICK AND WENT VERY SMOOTH. ... IT WENT SLICKER THAN I EVER THOUGHT."
JERRY PETTY, DIRECTOR OF PUBLIC WORKS

City Hall adjusts to move; departments distributed throughout city

DAVID FAIRBANKS
city editor

In one day of moving, unpacking, hooking up and settling in, Manhattan's City Hall has become Manhattan's city halls.

Monday was the first official day city offices started working out of different buildings. Now, instead of everything residing under one roof, there are four different locations that house the city's offices.

The city's fire substation has moved its employees and trucks to the public works maintenance building at 620 S. Juliette. The Utilities Department has moved to the Waste Water Treatment Plant.

The offices of the city manager, city clerk, public works, community development and half of the information services staff have relocated to the fire station headquarters at Denison and Kimball avenues. Finally, the department of finance, human resources, utility billing, customer service and the other half of information services have all moved to Manhattan Town Center.

Jerry Petty, director of public works, said the move went off without a hitch.

"The move was quick and went very smooth. Everyone was packed and prepared. It went slicker than I ever thought."

On paper, the move may seem to pose some relevant communication problems for city officials, but Gary Greer, city manager, said it shouldn't have a negative effect.

"We've been able to mobilize our entire mass unit and because of our technology, we haven't missed a beat," Greer said. "Everything will be business as usual."

For the public's convenience, all city telephone numbers and e-mail addresses will remain the same but there are a few changes that some people might not know about, Petty said.

First of all, the billing drop box at City Hall can no longer be used, Two new drop boxes have been installed at the mall. One is in the southeast parking lot between Sears and JCPenney and the other is just inside the mall's main entrance. People can also use the old drop boxes at Dillons and Dutch Maid, he said.

The gymnasium at City Hall, however, will remain open during the city's 15-month absence. All events scheduled in the gym will take place as planned.

The first stages of the hall's expansion and renovation have already begun. The contractor started installing a security fence on Monday. Asbestos removal starts today.

In a little more than a year the project will be completed and all city offices will move back to 1101 Poyntz Ave. Until then, city officials and employees will have to make do with their temporary facilities.

Petty said that shouldn't be a problem.

"We have a lot of boxes sitting around because we're still unpacking, but we're all smiling and we're still in business," he said.

City Hall moves offices

The offices of City Hall have relocated to different areas around Manhattan. The city's fire substation has moved to the public works maintenance building at 620 S. Juliette. The Utilities Department has moved to the Waste Water Treatment Plant. The offices of City Manager, City Clerk, Public Works, Community Development and half of Information Services have moved to the fire station headquarters at Denison and Kimball. The Department of Finance, Human Resources, Utility Billing, Customer Service and the other half of Information Services are now located in Manhattan Town Center.

More than 1,000 attend event to protest abortion in Wichita

WICHITA — More than 1,000 people stood at nine city intersections as part of the Life Chain, a national pro-life event in about 800 cities.

The demonstrators waved to passing vehicles Sunday and held signs saying "Abortion Kills Children" from 2 to 3:30 p.m. Similar demonstrations took place in 52 other Kansas cities.

It was the seventh Life Chain event in Wichita. It was endorsed by the Heartland Life Network, Greater Wichita Kansans for Life, Respect Life Office of the Wichita Catholic Diocese, and Right to Life of Kansas.

The Life Chain events began in Yuma City, Calif., in 1987. The first Wichita chain followed Operation Rescue's 1991 series of summer abortion protests in Wichita.

Student to plead guilty to larceny after conning his way into school

NEW HAVEN, Conn. — A man accused of conning his way into Yale University by altering his transcript and producing recommendation letters from nonexistent teachers will likely escape jail time if he repays the school some financial aid money.

Lon Grammer, 26, will plead guilty to larceny charges Monday, said his attorney, Norm Pattis. Under a plea agreement, Pattis said he will pay the school $100 a month for the next five years, a fraction of the $61,475 he received in financial aid grants and loans.

Without the plea, the California man faced 20 years in prison.

Yale officials said they knew nothing of a plea bargain.

Grammer was expelled from the Ivy League school in 1995, a month before he was expected to graduate with a political science degree. Police said he bragged to a roommate and was charged with fraud.

Grammer's average grade at Cuesta Community College in San Luis Obispo, Calif., was a C, but the transcript he presented to Yale admissions claimed he had nearly straight A's.

Yale is increasing its scrutiny of college applications.

Large cache of assault rifles taken in Indiana gun-store robbery

GREENWOOD, Ind. — Well-armed robbers stormed a suburban gun shop, shooting the clerk to death and making off with so many high-powered weapons that they had to make repeated trips to a waiting van.

"That keeps playing in my mind — that this could turn into something stupid and ugly," Police Chief Robert Dine said Monday. "They didn't take any of the cheap stuff. They didn't take any of what you would call a Saturday night special."

The robbery happened about 8 p.m. Saturday at Don's Guns in this suburb south of Indianapolis. The clerk, Steven Stapleton, was wearing a sidearm and fired at least one shot at his assailants before he went down, police said.

Police believe there were two robbers. They smashed glass cases and made off with semiautomatic handguns, assault rifles and 30-round ammunition magazines, police said.

"I don't know that it's drug-related, whether it's a gang situation. All I know is that they got the best possible weapons they could obtain out of this store, and these weapons are extremely dangerous in the wrong hands," Dine said.

A man went into the store shortly afterward and found the body of Stapleton, 30, toward the rear of the store.

Don Davis, the owner of the store, offered a $10,000 reward for information.

Collections department dedicated

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

In what has almost become a Hale Library tradition of non-stop receptions, the Richard L.D. and Marjorie J. Morse Special Collections Department was dedicated in a ceremony Monday evening.

Nearly 80 people turned out to honor the Manhattan couple who have collectively donated more than $250,000 to the library department and established the Consumer's Movement Archive. The Morse's recent $150,000 donation is going to an endowment for the department.

Graciously accepting the addition of a dedication plaque outside the department's fifth-floor door, Richard Morse thanked his friends and colleagues in the audience.

"I can't think of a higher honor than to be honored with what I think is the jewel of the library system," Richard Morse said.

Marjorie Morse, along with daughter Mary Morse of Chicago, was present for the ceremony and, although she is recovering from a stroke, was in high spirits.

Richard said he tried to remember just why he and Marjorie were interested in libraries until he recalled the fact that his mother was a librarian who had established a library in New Jersey. He said Marjorie also established the first library in Tallahassee, Fla., where Richard was a professor of family economics at Florida State University.

"We have been involved with libraries," Richard Morse said. "It's the one part of the university that cannot be subjected to the outside pressures the rest of us feel."

Richard Morse, a board member of the Consumer's Union, was also honored by special guest Rhoda Karpatkin, president of the union and a Lou Douglas lecturer at 7:30 tonight in Umberger 103.

"Dick is one of the few people now on the board who was deeply involved in the consumer's movement of the 1970s," Karpatkin said.

"Our history is very important to us and Dick is one of the embodiments of that history."

Morse, who was department head of family economics from 1955 to 1982 and stayed until the department was eventually dissolved around 1985, donated his papers to the Consumer's Movement Archive, which was established in 1987.

Karpatkin said Morse was also a visionary.

"A visionary understands you need an archive to preserve the history of the movement for further generations," Karpatkin said. "For that, I really want to say we appreciate you very much."

Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries, spoke of the Morses' devotion to fund raising and supporting the library.

"There are many people who claim friendship with libraries, but very few who act that friendship out," Hobrock said.

Hobrock then recalled the Morses' generosity in funding the purchase of new furniture for the special collections reading room and the refurbishment of the room in the 1970s Farrell Library building.

The prior gift of $100,000 from the Family Economics Trust, of which Richard Morse is a trustee, paid for the refurbishment.

The Morses also chaired the library's Essential Edge campaign from 1988 to 1993 to secure funding to build Hale.

"The true legacy of the Morses is the tradition of private fund raising and outreach," Hobrock said.

Tony Crawford, chair of the special collections department and university archivist, was master-of-ceremonies for the occasion.

After the ceremony, Crawford said the endowment will help provide funds the Legislature wouldn't normally appropriate. He said he hopes other people will contribute to the endowment to the archives.

Coverage of greeks discussed at meeting

COLE EHMKE
staff reporter

Collegian editor in chief Scott Ladd told the Interfraternity Council on Monday that the Collegian strives for equal coverage of the news.

Ladd was a guest at IFC's meeting for a question-and-answer session about how the Collegian covers Greek Affairs. Most of the discussion was about recent national and Kansas coverage of alcohol abuses, including the death of a Massachussetts Institute of Technology student from alcohol poisoning and a Lawrence caterer serving alcohol to minors at two K-State fraternity parties.

Ladd said he had no reasons for recent heavy national coverage of alcohol abuses in fraternities but suspected that the presence of controversy played a part.

Ladd's policy on news coverage is simple.

"If it's news, it runs," he said.

Ladd added that he tries to give fair coverage and the paper doesn't single out the greek community.

"In our coverage, and especially on the editorial page, we covered it as a larger issue."

He said recent news on alcohol abuse has been a wake-up call.

Barb Robel, adviser to Greek Affairs, said much of the recent coverage might have been because it was the beginning of the school year.

"If it had happened during the spring, it may not have gotten the coverage," she said.

The K-State system is active in risk management and has policies on substance abuse, hazing and human rights, Robel said.

David Butts, IFC risk management educator, said education is the key to solving problems and keeping risks down.

"Comparatively, we do a good job," he said.

In a response to a question about what material was quotable in an interview, Ladd said an interviewee should assume everything is on the record.

"It's safer that way," he said.

To a question about the threat of an advertiser pulling an advertisement because of content in the paper, Ladd said it's something that he considers, but it doesn't weigh in on a final decision.

Ladd said the Collegian covers what people want to know and what they need to know.

He also said, "There's the atmosphere that it's us against everyone. That's not the case."

"People perceive intent that's not there," Ladd said. "The Collegian is not out to get anyone. It's never been the case as long as I've been here."

Hamas leader returns home to Gaza Strip

ASSOCIATED PRESS

GAZA CITY, Gaza Strip — The spiritual leader of Hamas returned home to a delirious welcome from 10,000 supporters on Monday, part of a prisoner swap that left Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu struggling to explain why he struck a deal with the sponsors of bombings against Israeli civilians.

Sheik Ahmed Yassin, the nearly blind and paraplegic founder of Hamas, was greeted by ecstatic crowds in a Gaza City arena that was draped with black, green and red Palestinian flags and banners. "Hamas has engraved its name on the homeland," one banner said.

Yassin's return means Netanyahu will now have much less leverage in demanding that Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat crack down on Hamas, which opposes peace agreements with Israel and has carried out more than a dozen suicide bombings in the Jewish state since 1994.

The exchange of Yassin for two Mossad agents captured in a failed assassination attempt on a Hamas leader in Amman, Jordan, last month was worked out in more than a week of secret talks between the two countries. It put the prime minister in the awkward position of having to contradict

Week allows students to learn about other ways of life

So what are you doing this week?

Probably cramming for tests and other projects, maybe donating a little blood and thinking about Homecoming.

Perhaps you're missing out on a life-changing experience.

Throughout Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week and Coming Out Week, different groups are trying to convey a message. However, students might not be getting the message.

The groups are asking students and faculty to become more aware of racial, ethnic and sexual orientation issues and develop an understanding.

The groups have lined up activities, panel discussions, movies, guest speakers and other events in the hopes of conveying their messages.

All you have to do is attend. Listen to what is said and build a foundation of knowledge about issues confronting different groups.

Although the events only last one week, the understanding leads to a knowledge you can keep for a lifetime.

When you packed your bags and moved to college, part of you knew you would be moving into a microcosm of different cultures, ethnic groups and sexual orientations. Now is a good time to begin preparing for what's out there in the world beyond this university.

Not everyone is made from the same cookie cutter and that's what makes the world interesting.

Maybe at the end of the week, you'll walk away with something more and all it will cost you is a few moments of your time.

The calendar of events for Coming Out Week and Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week can be found on Pages 1 and 5, respectively. Take a second to see which events you can fit into your schedule.

Watch something, do something, see something or listen to something you normally wouldn't.

Take advantage of the diversity available. Attend the activities and ask questions.

Take your friends. Make new ones. Learn to accept the diversity in the world and on this campus.

WELCOME TO 'HELL' LIBRARY
STUDENTS' FEES SHOULD BE USED FOR LIBRARY RESOURCES

VIEWPOINT

BOYD FERRIS

BOYD FERRIS is a senior in electrical engineering. You can send e-mail to Boyd at ferris@ksu.edu.

One of the cornerstones of a good university is its library. The library distributes crucial information to faculty and students, and it is an icon representing the academic prowess of a university. Unfortunately, our library is an embarrassment.

K-State has let the library deteriorate, being ranked No. 11 in the Big 12. Sure, Hale Library has received a new face lift. It looks incredibly beautiful. However, it lacks the essential function of a library, which is to distribute and maintain a vast variety and amount of information.

The library has routinely cut subscriptions, which hurts students and faculty. Information is necessary for faculty members to keep up with the latest technology and concepts, giving their students a better education. It is also essential for anyone doing research. We need a great library for great research and education, which makes a great school.

The deterioration of Hale Library will continue as usual. More subscriptions are going to get cut. However, the library is probably going to add the Uncover system. Uncover is an electronic database of 17,000 periodicals, which is almost three times the amount of periodicals our library has right now. The idea sounds great, but a closer look reveals the fallacies of this system.

One big drawback of Uncover is that it is expensive. The Department of English recently reported to the Collegian that it would probably cost the library more than $14,000 extra for the department to use Uncover. It costs $16 per article plus the copyright fees. I can buy a few magazines for the price of one article. Why can't the library?

Another drawback to this system is the wait. It will take anywhere from one to two days for your selected Uncover article to get here. I think this wait will cause a lot of problems for students. After all, most of us are getting a minor in procrastination, and Uncover will definitely conflict with this trait ingrained within most of us.

The idea to cut subscriptions and to invest money into the Uncover system came from the university's Task Force to Plan for Financing the Library of the 21st Century. I think this task force should make decisions based primarily on need and quality rather than economics.

Why continue to degrade our library? Our library should be continuously improving and not declining in quality.

I think the library should be renamed Hell Library because soon people will be exclaiming "What the hell?" as they walk through the place trying to find information.

Why should the task force stop on price-cutting? Hell, let's cut the whole damn program. We'll save lots of money. Of course it would be a waste of a nice building, but I have an idea.

Let's raise millions of dollars and convert Hale Library into Hale Arena. We could have our football games in there on rainy days. We would probably have no problem raising money for this new construction. Not like trying to raise money for subscriptions — that's about impossible to do.

Hmmm . . . Come to think of it, I'm a little too impatient to wait for the construction to get done. I have another idea that will have quicker results. Let's improve the library. After consulting the Common Sense Task Force, I have a few suggestions.

Add $20 to the student fees for library improvements. I can hear all the conservatives moaning about this idea, but you people just chill out. A library is very important to have and maintain. I am willing to pay more in my tuition for improvements.

I also think the library should do more fund raising for subscriptions. If it can raise millions of dollars for a face lift, then I think it can raise a few hundred thousand dollars for subscriptions.

Our library is an embarrassment in the Big 12. We need to improve the library based on need and quality, removing the economic constraints.

Unfortunately, the needed revenue will be a burden placed on the students, but it is an investment worth making.

Who watches the watchers?
CONSUMERS UNION COULD USE IMPROVEMENT

For more than 60 years, it has helped defend American consumers against their traditional enemies, ranging from inefficient and ineffective regulators at the state and federal level to scrimshanking multinational corporations that fob off inferior merchandise on the public.

Over time it has become influential — in the 1960s it successfully pushed for automobile safety standards, and in the 1970s it was instrumental in banning the use of DDT derivatives.

But Consumers Union, whose president will be at K-State to deliver a Lou Douglas Lecture today, is not doing as well as it once was at its jobs of criticizing modern industrial design and explaining to the public the shortcomings of consumer goods.

In June 1996, the organization published in its magazine, Consumer Reports, the results of an exhaustive test of motor oils in New York taxicabs. The idea, according to the magazine, was that oil in a taxicab saw more severe service than oil in a private passenger car, and so this testing procedure would better distinguish among good and bad oils.

This testing produced some surprising results, which the magazine asked the public to take on faith, without describing its experimental procedures in detail or accounting for some possible sources of error. It urged car owners, for example, to change their oil once every 6,000 miles rather than 3,000 as recommended by their owners' manuals.

On the basis of a 6,000-mile run, it concluded that synthetic motor oils showed no demonstrable advantages over lubricants of similar weight and quality grade refined from high-grade natural paraffinic (Pennsylvanian) crude oil.

Yet the report did not explain how the experimenters had accounted for the fact that 80 percent of engine wear results from cold starts. Thus a New York taxicab left running continuously for 24 hours a day might experience less severe wear than a car started twice a day for commuting.

VIEWPOINT

JONATHAN WINKLER

JONATHAN WINKLER is a senior in physics. You can send e-mail to Jonathan at jnw@ksu.edu.

And by failing to directly study the cold-starting properties of synthetic oils, Consumers Union failed to examine several oil refiners' claims that their synthetic lubricants prevent wear during cold starts by clinging to the cylinder walls rather than draining into the oil pan.

Owing to this negligence, the consumer was forced to seek product information via that old standby — writing to the oil companies themselves and asking for "typical test data" on their products. And what about the fact that the taxicabs all had a specific type of GM engine?

Other tests this organization has done have not addressed relevant features of the product. For instance, none of Consumers Union's auto testing has considered how easy cars are to service. Consumer Reports has issued the seal of approval to the Ford Contour, which essentially hands a lot of business to quickie oil-change places, because the Contour's oil filter cannot be reached from above and can't easily be reached from underneath except in a mechanics' pit.

Consumers Union still ranks color print films by their image structure characteristics rather than other important criteria such as contrast rendition. It uses vague adjectives such as "excellent" or "very good" rather than a tabulation of objective test data including resolution (in RMS granularity or line-pairs per millimeter), geometric structure of dye particles, or recording-layer sensitivity.

Again, in order to choose a good color film, the photo hobbyist is forced to order data from the film manufacturers and test film using lens charts and Macbeth color checkers. Consumers Union doesn't even test some professional-grade films that can be mail-ordered more cheaply than the consumer films it usually tests.

While Consumer Reports has served as an important mouthpiece for necessary reforms in health care and the federal regulatory structure, it has failed as a critic of industrial design. When automakers decided to pinch pennies in the late 1980s and returned to disc-and-drum brake combinations, which overheat and fade more quickly than four-wheel discs, the magazine sat silent and said nothing.

In November 1996, it announced that Consumers Union would seek to have the Isuzu Trooper removed from the market for its tendency to tip over. Isuzu has defeated this action by successfully arguing to federal regulators that the testing done to show tipover hazard was not uniform or scientifically reproducible.

In order to better serve the American public as its single independent consumer advocate, Consumers Union must change obsolete features of its modus operandi. It must abandon its practice of using Consumer Reports as its primary mouthpiece.

It must make the full details of its testing protocols and its complete results available to the public, at no charge, so that interested and technically qualified consumers can determine how thorough its testing has been and how apt its criticisms of engineering design are.

Otherwise vague reporting and debacles like the Isuzu affair will compromise the organization's credibility and its ability to serve the American consumer.

Abortion letter needs corrections

Editor,

In his letter to the editor on Friday, Karl Allen showed that he lacked a full understanding of what he was saying in many ways. To begin with, he noted that babies inside and outside the womb are the same. This is all relative to the age of the fetus in question.

Allen said that both babies could eat, digest and discard wastes. One seriously overlooked fact here is that a fetus does all of this via transfer of these nutrients and wastes from the placenta to the mother's blood supply. The fetus's own blood supply circulates the nutrients and wastes directly to tissue, as the nutrients are already in a digested form.

The digestive tract of the fetus is not functional until it eats with its mouth after birth. Waste is transferred to the mother's blood for filtering and excretion by her excretory system. The waste removal system of the fetus is not yet functional. All these processes occur through the umbilical cord and placenta.

The organs of a fetus, such as those Allen listed, are not functional outside of the womb until at least the third trimester of pregnancy. Until then, the fetus relies entirely on the mother's systems to process and to acquire nutrients and oxygen.

Allen mentions that brain activity can be measured a few weeks after conception. There is activity, but the brain is severely underdeveloped at this time. A fairly decent analogy would be to think of the fetal organs as a Model-T Ford and those of the fully developed baby as a Porsche. They have the same purpose and general structure. But, one is infinitely more complex, and is capable of performing far better than the other.

To get down to the hard-core issue here is pointless. No one will ever change anyone else's mind about such a personal issue. So why annoy everyone trying?

Not to mention, why is it that any man can even pretend to fathom what a woman is going through in such a situation? Men should butt out, unless it's to support their wives, sisters, daughters or girlfriend.s Allen could never comprehend the issue the way a woman who is confronting it does.

Sports column was disrespectful

Editor,

I'm writing in response to Dan Merker's Friday column, "Cornhuskers can bring out the worst in even most level-headed, decent people."

My family, my friends and I were extremely disgusted and appalled by the complete lack of respect and dignity displayed by this article and the Collegian's decision to publish it.

I understand that Merker was just attempting to fire up K-State fans and intensify the rivalry. He is entitled to freedom of speech, but with that freedom comes a lot of responsibility. As I read his column, I wondered if he's mature enough to take on that kind of responsibility. Columns like this not only eliminate all credibility of the writer, but also reflect poorly on the editors, the paper and K-State.

I am upset that the Collegian would run such a disrespectful, tasteless article, and that Merker included the memory of someone who has died. Not only was my brother a "reasonably likable guy," but he strived to be the best person he could, on and off the field. He used his position to be a positive role model. How are you using your positions as editors and writers?

I am afraid Merker was mistaken by thinking he was speaking to a Husker fan when he wished the death on Lawrence Phillips instead of Brook. He was not a Husker fan, but a decent, moral human being who had respect for life. A "level-headed, decent" person does not wish death on anyone.

Just one last thought. The Huskers have a tradition of meeting at the 50-yard line after each game to praise the Lord. They are led in prayer by one of the many devout Christian coaches, and usually players from the opposing team join the Huskers on bended knee.

On Saturday night, about half the Husker team and several coaches were met by two K-State assistant coaches and one lone K-State player, Michael Bishop. When I look back on Merker's column, I think it's pretty ironic. Don't you?

Understanding reached through communication

OLGA DAVIS, assistant professor of speech communication, theater and dance, talks to a group of students and faculty in the Mural Room of Hale Library. The discussion was about diversity in classes.

▸ LIBRARY WELCOMES K-STATE FACULTY, students to discuss racial, ethnic misunderstandings.

STORY BY TONYA ALLOWAY

Students aren't accustomed to walking on campus and having complete strangers say, "Hi, how are you?" But some classes are promoting this behavior.

As part of Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week, Hale Library welcomed a group of about 20 students and faculty members to be a part of "What's Happening in Diversity Classes: A Student Dialogue."

The dialogue took place in Hale 403, in front of a mural that symbolizes the struggles of race relations.

The dialogue panel was led by Frances Vitali, graduate intern for multicultural research and resource for K-State libraries. Vitali said everyone has a right of expression and a right to be heard, and it is important to disagree in order to understand one another.

Students discussed that exclusion takes place unconsciously every day. The students acknowledged that eye contact, smiling or speaking to people of different races or genders will help increase ethnic harmony and inclusion.

The group stressed the importance of making a space for everyone, regardless of race or culture, and the need to realize the importance of interaction.

Toby Donning, senior in theater, said his Cultural Communications class gives him self-awareness.

He said it makes him think about how he interacts with people on a daily basis.

"It's the things we say that we don't even think about until later," Donning said. "That's the beauty of classes like this."

Leonardo Hernandez, graduate student in psychology and college personnel, said he experienced exclusion when he came to K-State. While expecting people of color to reach out to him, he said they did the opposite.

Hernandez said the student government doesn't represent the entire student population, and those who represent the student body should hear the points made in the dialogue.

"Identity is important to me, and I want to bring that component to the university," Hernandez said. "Isn't that the goal of this university — to ensure that diversity plays a role in education?"

Olga Davis, assistant professor of speech communication, theater and dance, said it is important to discuss how people relate in society.

"We need to expose students to this and create a new way of communications," Davis said. In her classes, she covers the relationship between language and culture, how society is created, the role of language in the way people define themselves, as well as how others define different groups.

Davis pointed out there is a difference between looking the same as someone on the outside and truly having something in common with them on the inside.

Another point made in the dialogue was the need to start discussion outside the group after Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week is over.

Molly Royse, multicultural coordinator for library services, said she was pleased with the turnout

Simple truth: Huskers won't lose to anyone

Nebraska won't be beaten this year. Tom Osborne won't let the team lose. For those of you who still believe K-State had a chance when it was down 6-7 in the first quarter and botched its first extra point attempt, let me repeat myself.

Nebraska won't be beaten this year.

If the Huskers were going to lose this season, they would have lost at Washington and Saturday to the Wildcats. But the simple truth is that Nebraska won't lose to K-State.

VIEWPOINT

D. SCOTT FRITCHEN

D. SCOTT FRITCHEN is a junior in mass communications. You can send your e-mail to Scott at dsf7477@ksu.edu.

They won't lose to anyone.

You drive down U.S. Highway 77 Saturday morning and see a spray-painted sign predicting a K-State victory.

You see purple flags flapping wildly above cars that also have Powercats plastered all over their rear windows, and you can't help but have hope.

You know in a matter of hours K-State could break the curse and you wish you could foresee the future and see the Wildcats finish on top.

You want to see the Wildcats win to experience the thrill of victory against a team they cannot beat. You want the impossible to occur, and for the first time in nearly 30 years, be a part of the celebration and flood the Aggieville streets until dawn, knowing that for once you are better than the Huskers.

You see a Bible verse about David knocking off Goliath posted along a quarter-mile stretch of I-77 and you see a small church offering hot dogs and ice cream to K-State fans before they enter the Nebraska state border 50 feet away, and chills run up your spine.

You feel like you're entering another country to fight in a war, not knowing when you'll return.

You can't help but want this team to win and erase a 28-game losing streak to Nebraska.

You feel like it's meant to be.

And as you pass through the small town of Beatrice, Neb., a tiny girl is standing in front of her home holding a K-State flag with all her might, a flag that is bigger and taller than she is, and you just know this year the Wildcats won't let her down.

But then reality hits. You're fighting to enter Memorial Stadium an hour later and all you see is red.

And it suddenly sets in: You're not in Kansas anymore.

And all the dreams of Coach Bill Snyder knocking off Osborne with a slingshot are erased with a 50-yard run by Ahman Green in the third quarter.

Nebraska is ahead 41-6 and you feel like crying.

There is a somber mood in K-State's visiting locker room after the game. K-State just lost 56-26 before 33 million television viewers and more than 75,000 fans, and all you have to do is look into Mark Simoneau's eyes to feel the pain of being beaten by the better team.

Even his 10 tackles weren't enough to stop Nebraska. His body ached, he had reporters' tape recorders hovering around his mouth and he couldn't put the loss into words.

What do you say when all you know how to do is lose to the same team every year? Snyder could hire a team of psychiatrists and they wouldn't begin to understand the mental block and the anguish K-State endures the week before they play Nebraska.

The Wildcats came to play on Saturday. They came to play in 1993, 1994, 1995, and 1996. With each defeat comes a greater hunger. But they'll have to wait another year.

Again.

Spend five minutes talking to any K-State player. They'll tell you about the letdown of losing every year. They'll tell you about how it just gets worse every year and how their emotions grow bigger and build up with each successive match-up against Nebraska.

The Wildcats have to win. They must win to be ranked No. 10 instead of No. 22. They must win to end the streak that plagues Snyder every year.

If the Wildcats won, it would be the biggest victory of Snyder's career and the best moment of all the players' lives. It would change K-State football forever.

Instead, they continue to lose and there's Osborne standing in his postgame press conference on the other side of the stadium telling the world that K-State isn't that bad. Even after the Husker victory he insists the Wildcats are as tough as anybody they'll face the remainder of the season.

But that isn't enough.

Somewhere, there's a tiny girl standing outside her home holding her K-State flag.

Her parents still refuse to tell her the bad news.

K-State lost again.

Volleyball team drops to 1-3 in Big 12 play

SAM FELSENFELD
staff writer

Somebody needs to give the K-State volleyball team some good news.

First, the Wildcats dropped their first two matches of Big 12 Conference play to Colorado and Nebraska.

Then, after picking up their first victory against Kansas, the Wildcats lost at Oklahoma on Saturday — a match many expected them to win, considering they beat the Sooners 3-0 both times the teams met last season.

And adding injury to insult, senior setter Devon Ryning was hurt in the Oklahoma match, the first such setback the Cats have faced this season.

Ryning, the team captain and floor leader, injured her left little finger. She practiced with a brace on it on Monday. However, as a setter, she needs to use all the fingers on both of her hands to gain ultimate control of the ball as she passes it on to attackers.

But that's where good news finally comes into play for K-State.

The Cats don't play until Friday when Baylor comes to Ahearn Field House, which could give Ryning enough time to adjust.

And given the diagnosis from Dr. Jeff Rudy, assistant athletic trainer, adjustment probably won't even be necessary.

The injury, which was originally feared to be a fracture, is only a sprain of the lower knuckle. Ryning will wear a splint for most of this week and have it off for the matches this weekend.

Rudy said the main problem with the injury is pain, which will go away with time — in this case, about two or three days.

Even with the injury, Ryning is doing fine. K-State coach Jim McLaughlin said she seemed to practice fine on Monday. He said she's tough and plays well through injuries.

Also, her teammates said they didn't notice a difference in her play.

Dawn Cady, who leads the Cats with 232 kills and is second among regular attackers with a .246 attack percentage, said Ryning's sets seemed normal in practice Monday, something to be expected considering her attitude.

"She's not an 'Oh, poor me' kind of player," Cady said.

Ryning, who with 719 assists this season has 4,487 through her K-State career — about 1,300 more than any Cat in school history, suffered the injury during the first game against Oklahoma.

However, she still put up big numbers during the match. She recorded 64 assists, eight short of her career- high in a five-game match.

In the match, K-State and Oklahoma bounced back and forth, but the Cats couldn't put together consistent runs.

"At times we played very good volleyball," McLaughlin said. "We just couldn't sustain it. It's not good enough to get ahead. We have to finish games.

"I thought we played hard the whole time. I just don't think we played real consistent."

The Sooners took game one 15-10, game three 15-12 and game five 15-13.

The Cats won games two and four, both by a 15-13 margin.

"Our effort is good, but we have to maintain consistency. We have to upgrade mentally," McLaughlin said.

In the loss, K-State had 115 digs, a new school record, including a career-high 27 by junior middle blocker Val Wieck.

Doubles team falls in Florida

K-STATE SPORTS INFORMATION

After putting themselves in position to meet the No. 1 doubles team in the country, K-State's Yana Dorodnova and Eva Novotna fell 6-2, 6-3 to Dawn Buth and Stephanie Nickitas of Florida in the second round of the ITA National Clay Courts in Orlando, Fla.

Buth and Nickitas are ranked No. 1 in the nation and have two NCAA titles to their credit.

"They had trouble holding serve against this team, and they hadn't up to this point in the tournament," said coach Steve Bietau. "Part of it was brought on by their own mistakes and part of it was forced by Buth and Nickitas."

On their way to the second round, the duo had to pass teams from Baylor, Miami and Mississippi State.

"I am certainly not unhappy with the way they played," Bietau said. "To get on the stadium courts with the No. 1 team was a great experience. They benefited from this tournament and the way they played."

Dorodnova and Novotna won the championship at the Travelers Express Invitational in Manhattan in September and returned from Florida with a 6-1 record.

Next up for the Wildcat tennis team is the Arizona State Invitational Oct. 10-12 in Tempe, Ariz. Representing the Cats will be Dorodnova, Novotna, senior Lena Piliptchak and freshman Anna Pampoulova.

Wrestling meet draws nearly 200 athletes

MICHAEL RYAN
staff reporter

K-State does not have a wrestling team, but after the turnout at last week's intramural meet, the school might want to consider starting one.

Nearly 200 students competed in the five-day event at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

Steve Martini, associate director of intramurals, was pleased with the participation and said the meet went well. He said he was pleased with the quality of the wrestling.

"The quality is always good because the wrestlers want to be there. It's always a good meet," he said.

Greg Ernzen, sophomore in business, won the All-U championship in the 150-pound weight class.

Ernzen, who wrestled at Immaculata High School, said a wrestling program at K-State is something the university might want to try.

"I think there's a lot of good, quality wrestlers at K-State," Ernzen said. "It's fun to go out there and wrestle again. That's my only competition throughout the year."

Chad Cotter, a former state champion from Paola, Kan., won the All-U 158-pound weight class.

Cotter, a senior, wrestled one year at Brigham Young University before coming to K-State.

"Winning the fraternity division was a bigger deal than winning the All-U," Cotter said.

There were 20 other participants in Cotter's weight class, making it the biggest bracket in the meet.

Cotter said it would take K-State a few years to develop a program, but liked the idea of having a team.

"I think it would be awesome to get a team," he said.

Ten of the participants in this year's meet were women.

Martini said the women were split into brackets of five.

Freshmen lead cross country team at OSU

JOEL WHITE
staff writer

The freshmen team of Annie Wetterhus and Brandon Jessop once again led K-State's cross country teams. This time it was in Saturday's Oklahoma State Cowboy Jamboree.

Wetterhus finished in fifth place with her personal best time of 18 minutes, 4 seconds in the 5,000-meter race.

The K-State women placed fifth with 116 points in the 12-team field. Joining Wetterhus in the top 20 were sophomore Kelly Andra at 17th place with a time of 18:36, and freshman Morgan Kadel at 19th place with a time of 18:44.

Baylor won the women's team competition with 55 points.

Jessop overcame what Coach Randy Cole called a conservative start to become the K-State men's highest finisher.

He finished the 8,000-meter race in 28th place with a time of 25:46.

After the first mile, no one passed Jessop, which he said was both good and bad.

"It was good that no one passed me after the first mile," he said. "But I was trying to run down the lead pack instead of running with the lead pack."

Of the 16 teams in the meet, five were from the Big 12.

Jessop said the race was a confidence builder for conference competition.

"I think it helped my confidence for running in the Big 12 because the conference meet is on the same track," Jessop said.

"I ran well there once, so hopefully I'll be able to do it again."

The Wildcat men placed seventh with 207 points. Junior Brent Stover was the second highest, at 45th with a time of 26:17.

Cole said freshmen Joe Letourneau and Adam Hobson had improved efforts in the race. Letourneau finished in 49th place and Hobson came in at 60th.

Arkansas won the meet with 32 points. Oklahoma State placed fourth and Texas placed fifth, the only two Big 12 schools to finish ahead of K-State.

Although Cole was happy with some of his individual runners, he said neither team ran well as a pack.

"We had some gaps between teammates, and we let too many people pass us down the homestretch," Cole said.

"Both teams probably were 30 points better than what they showed. But that's done, and we need to keep up the aggressiveness in practice and not skip into a passive mode."

Indians down Yankees 4-3, advance to face Orioles

ASSOCIATED PRESS

CLEVELAND — The Kid started it. The bullpen finished it. And for once, the Cleveland Indians finished off the New York Yankees.

They did it with a rookie who doesn't pitch like a rookie, and they threw in a little magic left over from their World Series team of 1995.

Cleveland finished the job with a 4-3 victory in a decisive Game 5 Monday night, ending this dramatic series and the Yankees' quest for a second straight and 24th World Series title.

The Indians' second trip to the ALCS in three years begins Wednesday with Game 1 in Baltimore.

Rookie Jaret Wright, 21 only according to his birth certificate, beat Yankees left-hander Andy Pettitte again.

Wright couldn't snap off fastballs in the high 90s forever, even on this great postseason roll that brings to mind names like Mike Boddicker, Fernando Valenzuela and Dave Righetti. The bullpen had to complete it.

Mike Jackson, the winner in Game 4's ninth-inning comeback, got the last two outs of the sixth. Left-hander Paul Assenmacher pitched 1 1/3 innings.

And Jose Mesa, who began the season in the courtroom instead of the bullpen, closed it out for his first postseason save since Game 5 of the 1995 World Series.

Mesa gave up a two-out double to Paul O'Neill in the ninth before getting Bernie Williams on a fly to left field for the final out.

"It's amazing," Wright said as Jacobs Field rocked behind him. "It's awesome. It's a great feeling."

Cleveland's offensive star was Manny Ramirez, who ended slides of 0-for-13 and 2-for-18 in the series with a two-run, ground-rule double off Pettitte in the third.

Wright, who beat Pettitte and New York at Yankee Stadium in Game 2, struck out five in 5 1/3 innings with the whole place standing on every two-strike count.

Pettitte, a road warrior in the playoffs, ran into trouble in the third. Ramirez's double and a single by Matt Williams made it 3-0.

Sandy Alomar, who tied Game 4 with an eighth-inning homer, led off the fifth with a double to left-center and scored on a sac fly by Tony Fernandez.

Pettitte retired eight straight after that, but the Indians had done enough damage.

By eliminating the Yankees, the Indians perhaps lifted a 40-year curse in which New York kept them spellbound.

Cleveland finished second five times in the 1950s to New York, and the Yankees were 15-5 at Jacobs Field before dropping two of three in the series this weekend.

In 1954, the Indians won a record 111 games, but got swept in the World Series by another New York team, the Giants.

The defending World Series champions would not go quietly, and that was fitting in this series that saw only one two-game winning streak — the one that clinched it.

Wright appeared to be losing velocity in the sixth and didn't make it through the inning. Mike Stanley, replacing Cecil Fielder at DH, led off with a wicked double to the gap in right-center. Wade Boggs, left out of the starting lineup again in favor of Charlie Hayes, lined a single up the middle to make it 4-3 and chase Wright.

Vizquel was right in the middle of the Indians' big inning, stealing second uncontested and scoring on Ramirez's double.

And Jim Thome, moved from third to first this season, made perhaps the defensive play of the series to snuff out a New York rally in the seventh.

"If he doesn't make that play, we might still be out there playing, or might be out of it," Cleveland manager Mike Hargrove said.

Derek Jeter beat out an infield single — although the replays seemed to show he was out. Indian-killer O'Neill hit a hot smash to Thome, who dove to his right and threw out Jeter from his belly.

Wright was magnificent again, rescuing the Indians from a season of pitching injuries with a bold postseason performance.

MUSEUM RETURNS TO ITS ROOTS WITH A SHOW OF WORK BY NATIVE SON JOHN STEUART CURRY

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

The Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art will return to its roots with a small show of work by native son John Steuart Curry.

"John Steuart Curry: Selections from the Permanent Collection," which runs through Jan. 11, gives a glimpse of the stormy career of Curry, who never quite reached favor with the people of Kansas.

Art Review

This small show doesn't claim to be anything more than some selected works and some loans from the Curry estate chosen to commemorate the art museum's first year of operation and the 100th anniversary of Curry's birth, Nov. 14, 1897, near Dunavant.

The highlight of the show is the first public showing of "Sun Dogs," oil on canvas (1930), since the museum opened. This painting was chosen, by way of ballot, for the K-State art collection by the Friends of Art in 1935. This painting was the first work by Curry to enter the collection of a Kansas public institution.

"Sun Dogs," a snowscape of the Heart Ranch in Barber County (southcentral Kansas) is a calm, unemotional reflective painting. It is not nearly as dynamic and, well, Curry-esque as the two paintings turned down by the Friends, "Manhunt," a lynch mob scene, and "Storm Over Missouri," a painting of rough weather that is now in poor condition. "Sun Dogs" itself, having been hanging in a dean's office on campus, was in need of repair, which explains its absence from the museum for the first year.

"Sun Dogs" is easily a Kansas landscape, but not all of Curry's work rings this recognizable.

This is especially evident in the nearby "Sunrise," oil on canvas (1935), a large, dramatically warm-weather landscape, more or less the same scene in "Sun Dogs," framed with clouds and a lyrical foreground. Here, the landscape of Heart Ranch, with its red hills and slopes, is more Texan and Oklahoman in nature.

To put Curry in context is to consider the Regionalist movement, of which he, Thomas Hart Benton of Missouri and Grant Wood of Iowa were the so-called Triumvirate of American Regionalism.

Curry spent most of his life in Westport, Conn., but always yearned for admiration from his home state. Kansans, outside of well-connected political elites such as Emporia newspaper editor William Allen White, considered Curry completely out of touch with the real Kansas that was ready to shed its rough image of religious fanaticism and violent weather.

To them, Curry was only willing to stereotype the state in his work. The publicity photos of Curry and Wood donning overalls no doubt also aggravated Kansans who saw Curry as an expatriate capitalizing on his childhood in Kansas. That might fly for the small-minded, isolationists between the wars, but in our CNN culture of today, it wouldn't have made much difference.

Hence, Curry's work never sold well in Kansas, even though New York's Whitney Museum of Art and Metropolitan Museum of Art snatched up some of his best work. Maynard Walker, Curry's dealer, tried several times to arrange successful exhibitions, but was most successful with the "Sun Dogs" ballot purchase, which had always touched Curry as a kind gesture on the part of K-State.

Perhaps Curry could have worked without scrutiny, had he not been pronounced as the new face of American art, the symbol of the heartlands, when he was in fact an East Coaster who had studied art in Paris.

Of course, in the politically correct times of today, it's hard to imagine anyone suggesting a John Brown sculpture to be placed on the capitol dome. Were the Regionalists the last group of American artists with a public voice who told it like it was?

The ultimate statements Curry made to Kansas were his infamous murals in the statehouse in Topeka, which were done from 1937 to 1942. "The Tragic Prelude," sketches of which are in the Beach museum show, depicts John Brown with outstretched arms holding the word of God in one hand, a "Beecher's Bible" in the other.

Brown is flanked by pro-slavery and free soil forces beneath him. A tornado swirls on the horizon next to a roaring prairie grass fire. The whole scene is a tortuous prologue to the "tragic" events to follow in the Civil War.

It's hard to grow up a Kansan without making a requisite elementary school trip to Topeka to catch sight of the fear-inducing murals. Even the quiet "Kansas Pastoral" mural of a white Kansas farmer and his family was no comfort for a second-grader scared of tornadoes.

There have been many responses to the murals, although the first in the state were mostly negative.

The figure of John Brown has often been compared to Michelangelo's Moses — so forget Regionalism being any sort of pure American style.

This show presages a planned retrospective of Curry's work to be exhibited at the Nelson-Atkins Museum of Art in Kansas City, Mo., in fall 1998. That retrospective is being organized by the DeYoung Museum of Art in San Francisco.

In 1951, in the Saturday Review of Literature, Benton wrote he had told Curry the year before his death in 1946 that he should feel good that he had come to a permanent place in American art.

To that, Curry replied, "I don't know about that. Maybe I'd have done better to stay on the farm. No one seems interested in my pictures. Nobody thinks I can paint. If I am any good, I lived at the wrong time."

Looking Back

1918 — The rambling wrecks from Georgia Tech dominated the helpless Cumberland College. This was one of the most lopsided wins in football history. Georgia Tech's Bulldogs ate the competition 222-0.

1922 — The first radio network — of sorts — was pioneered. It was a small network of just two stations: WJZ in Newark, N.J. teamed with WGY in Schenectady, N.Y. to bring the World Series game direct from the Polo Grounds in New York. Graham McNamee was the legend behind the microphone for that broadcast.

1951 — The Western Hills Hotel in Fort Worth, Texas, became the first hostelry to feature all foam rubber mattresses and pillows. They made great trampolines.

1982 — The musical "Cats" opened on Broadway. It was recently named to the Guiness Book of World Records for longest-running musical. Andrew Lloyd Weber's show is most memorable for its song "Memories."

3 charged with Cold War spying

ASSOCIATED PRESS

ALEXANDRIA, Va. — Three people, including a former Pentagon analyst and her husband, were charged Monday with spying for East Germany and Russia in an operation that began in 1972, federal prosecutors said.

The husband and wife team were code named "Ken" and "Tina" by their East German handlers in Berlin, court papers said. They used miniature cameras to photograph secret documents and shortwave radios to receive coded messages from their spy masters, prosecutors said.

Theresa Marie Squillacote, 39, the former Defense Department analyst; her husband, Kurt Alan Stand, 42, a labor union representative; and a third defendant, James Clark, 49, a private detective, were charged with conspiracy to commit espionage.

A 200-page affidavit filed in federal court makes clear that the alleged espionage ring extended beyond the three defendants.

The three were described in court papers as Communist Party sympathizers who met at the University of Wisconsin in Milwaukee during their student days in the 1970s.

Squillacote, who worked for the House Armed Services Committee before she went to the Pentagon, first came to the attention of the FBI in 1995. At that time, court papers said, she offered to be a spy in a letter to a South African government official who was a leader of his country's communist party. The FBI opened an undercover operation with agents posing as South African spies.

The FBI reviewed East German financial records that bore the defendants' code names and encrypted communications between the East German Ministry for State Security in Berlin and the East German embassy concerning the three, court papers said.

The defendants were also fingerprinted by former intelligence agents of East Germany's Foreign Intelligence Service — known as HVA — who worked at the East German Embassy here in the 1980s, the papers said.

After the unification of Germany in 1990, the three worked with their East German handlers "to create an espionage relationship" with the Soviet Union and later with Russia, the documents said. They allegedly made at least 10 overseas trips to meet with their handler in Spain, Sweden, Germany and Great Britain.

Squillacote got her job at the Pentagon after the German reunification to gain access to government secrets and recently sought a job at the White House Office of Management and Budget as a "stepping stone" to a position at the National Security Council, court papers said.

Stand is accused of beginning his spying activities in 1972 when he was recruited by East Germany to line up spies in Washington and was introduced to East German officers through his father, the documents said.

He recruited James Clark in 1976 and his wife about the time the couple married in 1980, the papers said.

The three were arrested on Saturday after an FBI sting operation in which they allegedly turned over documents to undercover agents posing as spies for South Africa.

Stand was identified as a regional representative of the International Union of Food, Agricultural, Hotel, Restaurant, Catering, Tobacco and Allied Workers Association.

Clark, a private investigator from Falls Church, Va., once worked for a defense contractor at the Rocky Mountain Arsenal in Boulder, Colo. He had access at that time to secrets on chemical warfare, including the formula for the deadly nerve gas Sarin. Notes on Sarin found in a search of his home indicated the information was given to the East Germans, court papers said.

Clark is accused of giving East Germany classified State Department documents about the Soviet leadership, the Soviet's strategic nuclear doctrine as well as problems in the military of Soviet bloc countries, FBI agent Katharine G. Alleman said in the affidavit. She said a State Department employee admitted giving documents to Clark.

Spy author David Wise, who wrote a book on the Aldrich Ames espionage case, said in an interview that materials provided to East Germany agents were almost certainly turned over to the Soviet KGB.

All three were charged with conspiracy to commit espionage on behalf of East Germany, the Soviet Union, Russia and South Africa. If convicted, they would face a maximum sentence of life in prison and a $250,000 fine. If certain statutory criteria are met, they also could face the death penalty.

LAWS

Deb Taylor, co-faculty adviser for BGLS, said the laws are unnecessary.

"If people are not getting convicted of it," she said, "why have the laws?"

Taylor said homosexuals are treated as criminals.

"Gays and lesbians can lose their kids," she said. "And K-State students can lose their jobs. It is a problem."

Movsovitz said his legal fees are being paid by the American Civil Liberties Union, and if he were convicted he would have to pay $200 and would be banned from Gage Park for two years.

Paul Donovan, president of BGLS at K-State, said Movsovitz was a good speaker to start the week.

"What he is dealing with is real-life situations," he said.

because the dialogue took place at a busy time of day.

She said she wants the dialogue to continue after the week ends.

Royse said the Mural Room was chosen as the site for the dialogue because it was designed to be a new multicultural center for the century.

The room was the original site of the early multicultural center in 1971, and it was an obvious renovation and expansion when the library construction began.

The group talked about the need for other departments outside American Ethnic Studies to infuse diversity into their curriculum.

The group also discussed learning inside and outside of the classroom.

"Once it's set, it's something Student Senate doesn't review," he said. "It's set in stone until the bond is retired."

In addition to the stadium expansion, the committee also discussed compensation for some elected officials of student government.

Bill Muir, Joint Committee on Officers' Compensation Committee chair, said the committee was formed in March 1997 to examine the salaries of student officers.

"There needed to be a way to set student officer salaries," Muir said.

He said the committee solicited information from other Big 12 universities, and compensation at K-State was middle to low in comparison.

Student body presidents at some universities, in addition to monetary compensation, also get complimentary basketball tickets, free parking and discounted meals at the student unions.

Although the committee isn't proposing additional perks, it is proposing salary increases for various members of Student Governing Association as well as partial payment in scholarships.

If the recommendation goes into effect, the Office of Student Activities and Services budget would increase $6,350.

HAMAS

his tough-on-terrorism credo in order to ensure the safety of the two spies.

Netanyahu, speaking to reporters Monday night, said the government had decided to set up a committee to investigate the failed assassination attempt. But, he said, "As prime minister, I have the highest responsibility to fight in every possible way against terror. This is a war. There are no concessions in the war against terror."

As part of the swap, Israel also freed 20 Palestinian and Jordanian prisoners, who returned home Monday. Both Israeli and Jordanian officials said more prisoners would be released in the next two weeks.

A Jordanian military helicopter carrying Yassin touched down outside Arafat's headquarters in Gaza City Monday.

Yassin was carried off the helicopter in a wheelchair as Palestinian women wailed with joy and supporters crowded around trying to hug and kiss him. He was then driven in an ambulance to the Yarmouk Sports Stadium, where he called for Palestinian unity.

"There must be no divisions among the Palestinian people," the ailing Yassin whispered to an aide, who repeated the words out loud. The supporters, many of whom had waited in the sun for hours, cheered, whistled and chanted "Allahu Akbar!" or "God is great!"

Officials in Arafat's government put a positive spin on Yassin's return, stressing he had spoken in the past of halting attacks and working with Arafat.

They also said Yassin's presence would mean the center of authority in Hamas would shift back to Gaza, and out of the hands of more radical leaders abroad.

Arafat himself, however, was conspicuously absent from the homecoming for his biggest political rival, apparently unwilling to be seen standing next to Hamas leaders delivering fiery anti-Israel speeches.

Before leaving Amman, Yassin made ambiguous remarks about violence. "We will remain seekers of the peace, but if it is impossible to restore our rights by peace, then we will fight the occupation," he said.

McNair panel provides insight to group

TONYA ALLOWAY
staff reporter

Four students constituted a panel Monday afternoon in the Tower Room of Hale Library to discuss the McNair Scholars Program and its benefits. The theme was "Developing Educators for the 21st Century to Affect Multicultural Harmony and Equality."

Kathleen Greene, director of education and personal development, introduced the panelists and told the history of the McNair Scholars Program, which now exists in 100 locations in the United States.

The program is named in honor of Ronald E. McNair, astronaut and physicist. McNair was born in a segregated community and confronted many racial and economic barriers — like many of the McNair scholars.

The program is designed to prepare educationally talented undergraduate students and encourage them to go on to graduate school. The ultimate goal, Greene said, is to diversify teaching ranks.

The panelists talked about their internships and research projects, as well as the work they did with their mentors.

Teresa Burns, senior in geography, did her research on the Lawrence trafficway and the different cultural perspectives on natural resource development.

Burns said there are still a lot of general misunderstandings about cultural differences. She said that many people have problems in obtaining education, and the mentorship program within the scholars program shows anything is possible.

"It's there for the taking," Burns said. "Just reach out and take it."

Stella Houston, senior in computer science, said she likes learning about different cultures and exposing others to those differences.

Houston did her research on mothers and exposure to technology. As a mother of two, she said she realized many mothers become excluded from society. By exposing them to technology and to the Internet, she said they can create their own empowerment.

Amanda Rodrîguez, senior in art history, did her research with Sidney Goodman, an artist who deals with racial issues in his art. Rodrîguez said Goodman overcame many racial and social problems in his own life, as well as difficulty trying to find who he was.

"We all go through that, finding ourselves and our place," Rodrîguez said. She said an individual's way of life determines identity and obtaining that identity requires education.

"Everyone finds a way to express themselves," Rodrîguez said. "Some people do it in ways that aren't all that good."

Rodrîguez said the program stresses time management and preparation — an important part of success. She said she appreciates the opportunity to give other people well-roundedness.

"It's a way to show people you're more than just a number," Rodrîguez said.

Increased seating in stadium far from realization

▶ What are the plans?
Students might pay $1 more per credit hour with a cap at 12 hours per semester, $24 per year maximum. It would take 15 years to raise Athletic Director Max Urick's $14 million rough estimate.

JOHN HENDERSON
senior staff writer

Max Urick's hopes to increase seating at K-State's football stadium are a long way from being realized.

Urick, director of the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics, said he'd like Student Senate to pass a referendum bill that would put the issue of raising student privilege fees to pay for the new construction to a student body vote.

But for that to happen, said Aaron Otto, chair of the Privilege Fee Committee, Student Senate would have to pass a bill authorizing the referendum. And the legislation hasn't even been written.

"We're at step one-half out of about 30," Otto said.

Urick said the whole reason he wants to increase stadium seating is because of the rising demand for more tickets than are in existence, for both students and for the public.

Urick

KSU Stadium has about 7,500 permanent seats reserved for students, but another 1,000 extra bleachers have been set up at the southeast end.

Urick's plan to increase the permanent seating for both students and general public includes the removal of those bleachers and completely reconstructing the upper deck on the east side.

The new construction might be made to raise the number of permanent student seating to 10,000. The total seating would be increased from about 38,000 to nearly 45,000.

Otto

Urick told Otto's committee Monday that he'd like the referendum to have three options: Students could elect for 10,000 student seats, 9,000 seats or keep the status quo of 7,500.

For the first plan, students might pay $1 more per credit hour with a cap at 12 hours per semester, $24 per year maximum. For the second plan, students would pay half as much per year.

To pay Urick's rough estimate of $14 million, students would pay the extra dollar for the next 15 years.

Urick said if either of those two plans were to be approved by the student body, the athletic department would be willing to freeze the price of tickets for up to five years. Right now, it costs $60 a year for students to attend home football games.

The stadium would also have to expand its handicapped seating and build new concession stands and restrooms, the latter of which would probably require an extension of the existing sewer system.

Urick said a bond would have to be established and paid off if the athletic department were to raise ticket prices for the expansion.

"You can't establish a bond on ticket sales. It's too speculative," he said.

Jeff Dougan, chair of Student Senate, said that's the reason there would have to be a referendum.

"We can't fund any capital improvements without a referendum," he said.

Sixty percent of the students who voted on the referendum would have to support paying for expansion for the Privilege Fee Committee to allow the increase in fees, he said.

If Senate wanted to amend or repeal, it would have to create a new bill within a year, and three-fourths of Senate would have to vote in favor of the measure.

Urick said he'd like the referendum to occur by mid-November, and he wants to travel to campus and greek housing to explain the expansion.

He said the pending increase of tuition ordered by the Kansas Board of Regents makes the issue a tough one, but he would like students to be willing to pay for what they've been demanding.

Court kills legislative term limits

ASSOCIATED PRESS

SAN FRANCISCO — A federal appeals court struck down California's legislative term limits law on Tuesday, taking away a powerful broom that swept scores of longtime lawmakers out of office.

Now, many incumbents who were faced with packing up are instead thinking about re-election.

One of the most famous targets of the law — longtime Democratic Assembly Speaker and current San Francisco Mayor Willie Brown — said he feels vindicated, even though he has no plans to return to the Legislature.

"After all these years, I was able to have a court say I was right: Term limits are unconstitutional," Brown said.

In a 2-1 ruling, the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of appeals stopped short of deciding whether the 1990 term limits law violated the rights of voters to support their chosen candidate or the rights of candidates to run for office. The court instead said the initiative failed to tell the public how severe the limitation was: a lifetime ban on seeking the same office.

The fact that the measure permanently barred a legislator from running for the office once that lawmaker reached the limit was not stated in the text of the initiative or in the official analysis sent to voters in the ballot pamphlet, the court said. It became clear only in a 1991 California Supreme Court ruling upholding the measure.

"The Constitution requires us to invalidate an initiative if it fails to provide adequate notice to the voters that it would severely burden the people's fundamental rights," said the majority opinion by Judge Stephen Reinhardt. "In matters this important, the state simply must tell its citizens what they are voting on."

Deborah La Fetra, a lawyer for sponsors of the 1990 initiative, called the ruling a slap in the face to California voters.

"The people knew full well they were voting for a lifetime ban," La Fetra said. She said she would ask the Supreme Court to block the ruling, which is scheduled to take effect in three weeks.

Proposition 140, approved by 52 percent of the voters, limits California Assembly members to three two-year terms and state senators to two four-year terms. It led to a complete turnover in the leadership of both

THE COHEN-ESREY DECISION

TABLED AGAIN

▶ CITY COMMISSION EXAMINES Cohen-Esrey development issue.

JENNI EVANS
staff reporter

The Manhattan City Commission tabled the proposed Cohen-Esrey Planned Unit Development issue after nearly five hours of discussion at Tuesday night's meeting.

Mayor Bruce Snead said the Commission would decide on the proposed development in its next legislative session, Oct. 21.

More than 100 people gathered at Dwight D. Eisenhower Middle School to discuss issues and concerns surrounding the addition of the $3.2 million Sundance development project.

About 20 residents from the surrounding neighborhoods voiced concerns on a range of topics including flooding, which they said is a result of the lack of storm water management. Residents said the flooding problem needed to be addressed before building additional homes.

Cohen-Esrey's stance on the flooding issue is that it is a problem that has been around for a long time and construction of the development will not worsen the situation. The company also plans to make improvements on the drainage system.

Another concern was the increased traffic along Casement Road, north of Parker Drive. Citizens said the added traffic would pose a threat to children traveling to and from school. There are no sidewalks in that area.

Larry Reese, Manhattan fire chief, spoke against the development because of safety concerns in case of a fire.

"It's still a single access development, and I will continue to voice my opposition," he said.

He said although the development meets all its requirements, by having only one access road, emergency vehicles would be faced with problems getting in and out.

Residents also argued the increase in children would have a negative effect on area schools that might already be full.

Debbie Nuss, Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 school board president, said the district's schools are now 90 percent full and still have room for more students.

Regular maintenance and upkeep was another concern voiced in the meeting. Residents said they were worried the housing would be low quality or deteriorate over time.

Tracy Taylor, Cohen-Esrey president, said that wouldn't happen. He said there would be an on-site manager and a full-time maintenance worker to take care of upkeep.

"It's in our own self-interest to build quality homes," he said.

The planned unit development was brought before the Manhattan Urban Area Planning Board in September. After review, the board recommended the City Commission deny Cohen-Esrey's proposal.

Students can choose doctors at health center

JACOB JANSONIUS
staff reporter

Students can decide their fate at the Lafene Health Center. No, they can't decide when they will return to health, but many students do not know they can choose their own doctors.

Jeremy Lehning, junior in elementary education, said his doctors were just assigned to him.

"Whenever I go into the doctor's office they just tell me to have a seat, and they will be with me in a moment. They have never asked me what doctor I wanted to see," Lehning said. "I thought I was just assigned a doctor."

> If a student wants a specific doctor, they will work around your schedule. They will find a time when you are available to see that doctor. Students have always been able to do it that way.
> • Julie Tarara
> Student Health Advisory Committee member

Lafene does assign doctors, but only if the students do not request a specific doctor. Any doctor on staff can be requested if an appointment is made. If no specific request is made, a doctor that is on duty will be assigned.

Julie Tarara, member of the Student Health Advisory Committee, said students can decide whom they see and when they want to be seen.

"If a student wants a specific doctor, they will work around your schedule," she said. "They will find a time when you are available to see that doctor. Students have always been able to do it that way."

An advantage to selecting a specific doctor would be gaining trust and familiarity. Lehning said he would feel more confident if he saw the same doctor every time.

"I think they would know a little more about you if they had seen you before. If somebody different sees me every time, I always wonder if they know my entire situation," Lehning said. "One person could track me better. That's the way they do it back home."

Being homosexual, an adolescent, and living in the Bible Belt of the United States wasn't easy, but leaving was.

"I'm a refugee of Kansas, was glad to leave," Renner said.

But Tuesday afternoon he was back, at the K-State Student Union, to talk about some of the struggles homosexuals and other minorities face.

In his speech, "Racism and Homophobia," Renner discussed some of the fundamental and unconscious prejudices people have toward minorities.

"Prejudice in itself is not always bad. For example, prejudice towards a certain food or football team is fine," he said. "But when we have prejudices toward other people, they are generally not good."

Eurocentrism leads to racism, and racism leads to oppression, Renner said. Eurocentrism is the belief that the only world history is European history. It ignores the contributions of African-Americans, American Indians and other groups.

> Prejudice in itself is not always bad. For example, prejudice towards a certain food or football team is fine. But when we have prejudices toward other people, they are generally not good.
> • Christopher Renner

Changing attitudes toward minority groups are affected by how educators teach, a subject Renner has some ideas on.

As an English instructor at the University of Naples in Italy, he has helped write textbooks for learning English that teach about racism, immigration, human rights and global responsibility while students learn their ABC's.

In Italy, like the United States, immigration is a hot topic that has revealed some long-hidden prejudices.

Renner said he hopes that through education Italians can diffuse further problems.

"We really helped to start an educational revolution there, and the response to the book was great," he said.

Renner said he is also inspired by what he sees going on at K-State. Although he didn't attend K-State but went to Cloud County Community College, he said he knows attitudes are slowly changing. The fact that there are such things as Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week and Coming Out Week is encouraging to him.

"Little inroads are being made, and some of these people have tremendous courage," Renner said.

2 men arrested for abduction, slaying of 10-year-old boy

SOUTH BERWICK, Maine — Divers Tuesday found the body of a 10-year-old Massachusetts boy who was killed, authorities say, after he refused two men's offer of $50 and a bicycle to have sex.

Jeffrey Curley's body was found in a plastic container filled with cement and lime in the Great Works River, a tributary of the Piscataqua River, which divides New Hampshire and Maine.

Jeffrey was allegedly kidnapped near his Cambridge, Mass., home Wednesday by two men who had stalked him for two weeks. He was smothered with a gas-soaked rag, then brought to an apartment in Manchester, N.H., where his body was sexually molested.

One of the suspects told police the two dumped the body off a bridge somewhere near Portsmouth, N.H. The body was found about 10 miles from where the search started in Portsmouth on Friday.

Charles Jaynes, 22, an auto reconditioner from Brockton, Mass., and Manchester, N.H., was charged with murder and kidnapping this morning in a state court in Newton, Mass. Both were ordered held without bail.

Police say a second suspect confessed to the crime and told police where to begin looking for the body.

Officials were investigating whether the suspects were also involved in other child abduction cases.

1.1 million automobiles recalled by Chrysler Corp. for belt defect

AUBURN HILLS, Mich. — Chrysler Corp. is recalling several makes of minivans and automobiles because of potential seat belt and steering problems.

Seat belt buckle covers on the front and rear seats of 1991-93 minivans may dislodge and cause the seat belts to be only partially latched, the company said Monday.

Included in the minivan recall are the Dodge Caravan and Grand Caravan and Plymouth Voyager and Grand Voyager models. Chrysler said it will contact 1.1 million owners in the U.S. as well as about 214,000 owners in Canada and abroad.

Chrysler spokeswoman Michele Tinson said no injuries were reported from the seat belts but that several owners had complained.

Also facing recall are 1995 Dodge and Plymouth Neon models. Tests on those models revealed that severe damage to the Neon's undercarriage could separate the steering column and cause a loss of steering.

Tinson said seven injuries have been blamed on the steering wheels in 14 reported accidents.

The Neon recall will affect about 375,000 U.S. owners and 100,000 owners in Canada and abroad. Vehicles will be serviced at no charge, Tinson said.

Hurricane Pauline threatens Mexico's southern Pacific coast

HUATULCO, Mexico — Hurricane Pauline roared toward Mexico's southern Pacific resort coast Tuesday, packing sustained winds of 120 mph after gaining surprising strength from warm waters.

In two days, Pauline has grown from tropical storm to an extremely strong hurricane, bordering on a category four storm out of a possible five on the scale used by the U.S. National Hurricane Center.

"This is a very dangerous hurricane. This is the real thing, and I don't see anything to make Pauline weaken before it hits the coast," forecaster Max Mayfield said at the center in Miami.

At 5 p.m. EDT, Pauline's eye was about 160 miles south-southeast of Puerto Angel off Mexico's Oaxaca state. Mayfield said the storm was moving toward possible landfall today.

Aftershock in central Italy destroys art, terrifies residents

ROME — A strong aftershock hit central Italy on Tuesday, terrifying residents and further scarring their beloved monuments just 12 days after a pair of forceful quakes killed 10 people and damaged a large number of buildings.

The famed Basilica of St. Francis of Assisi sustained further damage in the early morning tremor, and four people were injured in the Marche region.

Earthquakes in the area are often followed by weeks or months of aftershocks, but experts said the strength of the recent ones was unusual: a magnitude of 4.9, compared to 5.7 for the initial quakes last month.

Twin quakes Sept. 26 killed 10 people and caused widespread destruction to homes and the hundreds of medieval churches, towers and palazzi that enrich the area.

Authorities say it could cost more than $1 billion to repair the quake-damaged buildings.

THIRST FOR TV FAME?

STAR IN YOUR OWN TELEVISION SEGMENT!

Gatorade Thirst Quencher

As part of the "Get Big 12 Gear!" promotion, Gatorade and FOX Sports Net are looking for one student (male or female) to show thousands of television viewers, "what's hot on campus." If selected, you'll cruise campus in the Gatorade Hummer and show why Kansas State University rocks the Big 12!

Each week FOX Sports Net will spotlight a Big 12 campus during its television program, "Big 12 Showcase." You can co-host the segment—no special talent required—simply:

1 answer these three questions...
1. What's "Hot on Campus?" Why?
2. Why should you represent Kansas State University on the "Big 12 Showcase?"
3. What types of activities/sports are you involved in? Any special talents, skills?

2 enclose with a recent picture...

SHEILA HOCHHAUSER speaks at the Manhattan Jewish Congregation's synagogue Tuesday evening. Hochhauser described Jewish holy days and traditions.

Jewish speakers raise awareness

AMY BICKEL
staff reporter

Jews in Manhattan were restricted to living in certain places before World War II.

"If you were a Jew you couldn't just live anywhere," Charlotte Edelman, a member of the Manhattan Jewish Congregation said Tuesday in a speech she gave for Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week at the congregation's synagogue.

Edelman spoke about the history of Judaism in Manhattan, and Sheila Hochhauser spoke about the Jewish high holy days.

"We have some pockets of prejudice, but nothing like it was," she said.

Things are different today than 30 years ago when the synagogue was first being built. The community has allowed Jewish residents to become much more active.

There are 35 families involved with the congregation. In the 1940s, the congregation had more than 100 families. Many of the families were in the military.

Many of the traditions the congregation celebrates are those of other Jewish congregations around the world.

Hochhauser, who is the president of the congregation, said Friday was the beginning of the Jewish new year, Rosh Hashana.

"The Jewish year is 5758," she said. "The reason it comes when it does is because of harvest."

She said this is when the Book of Life is opened and stays open until the end of Yom Kippur, which begins when the sun sets on Friday and ends after the first two stars come out on Saturday.

During Yom Kippur, Jews fast. They are not allowed to eat or drink anything during this time.

"Yom Kippur is a day of atonement," Hochhauser said. "Many Jewish people will spend the whole day in synagogue."

Also during the holiday, Yizkor is celebrated. The congregation remembers those who have died.

"It's a really moving time," Edelman said.

Hochhauser also discussed Chanukah.

"With it close to Christmas, people think it's a big Jewish holiday, but it's not," she said. "It celebrates a war victory."

Sara Emeson, sophomore in architectural engineering who attends the synagogue and is president of Hillel, a Jewish organization on campus, said some people follow Judaism more strictly.

"It's a personal choice. It varies from person to person," she said.

Emeson said she thought having speakers on the Jewish religion helped raise awareness.

"It lets groups on campus and groups in the area know there are a lot of other things out there," she said.

Ambassadors replace homecoming royalty

ASHLEY YOULE
staff reporter

Homecoming kings and queens are a thing of the past. Like many universities, K-State had kings and queens, but the early 1970s brought a change in the way K-State named its royalty.

In the early 1970s, K-State decided to change the title and duties of its kings and queens. It was still a great honor to be named the K-State ambassador but along with the new title came responsibilities.

"This way the ambassadors have a real responsibility to serve the students, rather than just having it be an honored position," Heather Lansdowne, assistant director of alumni programs, said.

Each Homecoming, K-State students elect one male and one female student to be the university's ambassadors.

"The ambassadors are chosen to represent the student body while attending certain alumni and recruiting events during the year," Lansdowne said.

Five weeks prior to Homecoming, students can apply for the K-State ambassador position. Once the application has been filled out, students sign up for an interview, Lansdowne said.

"There are two rounds of interviews. The first is with student leaders in organizations such as Student Governing Association, greek organizations and residence life groups," she said. "The second round is with K-State faculty, such as those involved in student recruitment and with the Alumni Association."

In the first round, the applicants are interviewed by a panel of students who test their communication skills, enthusiasm and knowledge of the university. Following this first round, the panel narrows down the number of candidates to be interviewed in the second round, Lansdowne said.

"At that time, it was the most difficult interview process I'd ever been through," current K-State ambassador Ryan Laudermilk, senior in preoptometry and Spanish, said. "It was intimidating speaking in front of my peers."

The second round consists of a similar format with faculty, the only difference being the applicants have to prepare a three-minute presentation on the topic of the Homecoming theme. After the presentation has been given, the faculty asks questions similar to those asked in the first round, Lansdowne said.

Following this final round, the finalists are immediately chosen and notified.

The ambassadors serve a one-year term, beginning with the Homecoming week, Lansdowne said.

"When the Alumni Association has official events, the ambassadors attend them to represent the students," she said.

Traveling is also a big part of the job, allowing the ambassadors to visit with as many prospective students as possible, she said.

"In the fall, we traveled about once a week," Laudermilk said. "Most of our visits were in Kansas, however I did make one visit to another state."

In addition to traveling, the ambassadors assist in the Landon Lecture Series and help with recruitment with Student Alumni Board, Lansdowne said.

"The most rewarding experience is traveling everywhere meeting the accomplished alumni," Matt Urbanek, 1995-96 K-State ambassador, said. "It's one of the most enjoyable positions a student can have because you talk about what it's like to be a student on a college campus."

This year's finalists are Kelli Ludlum, Sara Reser, Mandy Reese, Mark Barkman and Jason Heinrich.

"Students will have the opportunity to vote the Wednesday of Homecoming week until that Friday," Lansdowne said. "The final ambassadors will be named at the halftime of the Homecoming game."

Derby to repair its heating, cooling

MATT KREPS
staff writer

Air conditioning and heating are off in the Derby Complex.

The outage is a planned interruption to begin upgrading the facility's aging heating and cooling systems.

Skyler Harper, assistant director of the Department Housing and Dining Services, said the complex, which includes Haymaker, West, Ford and Moore halls, will receive new cooling towers, controls, pipes and valves. The upgrades will allow Housing and Dining to better control temperatures in the four residence halls and Derby Food Center.

The upgrades will also let Housing and Dining monitor energy and control the temperature of heating and cooling water in each building. Previously, each building received the same temperature of water, creating hot and cold zones in the complex.

The outage is timed to coincide with cooler weather. If the weather stays nice, residents should not experience too much discomfort, Harper said.

The heating system will be turned on again by Oct. 30. All work is scheduled to be completed by April 1.

Jeremy Warren, Haymaker Hall president, said the temperatures in the residence halls are not uncomfortable.

"It hasn't been that warm," Warren said. "If you have your windows open, it's not that bad."

Residents were warned in advance of the service interruption. If the weather becomes too cold, the heating system will be turned on earlier.

Memorial for Hallauer planned for Monday

ZACH VADER
staff reporter

Services for Susan Hallauer, junior in elementary and special education, will be at 2 p.m. Thursday at Soldier Christian Church in Soldier, Kan., with the burial in the Netawaka Cemetery.

Family and friends can meet from 7 to 9 p.m. Wednesday at the Chapel Oaks Funeral Home in Holton, Kan.

Hallauer, 20, was involved in a two-car accident last Saturday at the intersection of U.S. Highway 75 and Jackson County Road 254. She died Monday at the St. Francis Hospital in Topeka.

Hallauer moved to Jackson County in 1988. She graduated from Jackson Heights High School in 1995.

Hallauer was a member of the Soldier Christian Church, where she was an assistant with Sunday school classes. She was also a member of the Future Teachers of Tomorrow, Fellowship of Christian Athletes and the National Educators Association.

There will be an on-campus memorial service Monday. The time and place will be announced in the next few days.

OURview

Our View, an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board, is written after a majority opinion is formed. The editorial board consists of Collegian editors and other staff members. Our View is the Collegian's official opinion.

Collegian apologizes for offensiveness of Berringer comments

The Collegian does not make a practice of explaining or justifying any fair comment in our columnists' columns. All opinions are strictly those of the writers and are defended as such.

But when comments stir up pain and open a sensitive wound, as was the case in Friday's sports column, "Cornhuskers can bring out worst in even most level-headed, decent people," the issue is no longer one of criticism but one of sensitivity and taste.

The sports world lost a promising athlete and an exemplary human being when Husker quarterback Brook Berringer's two-seater, Piper Cub plane crashed outside Raymond, Neb., April 18, 1996.

Berringer replaced injured quarterback Tommie Frazier in 1994 and helped guide the Huskers to the first of consecutive national championships. Berringer had a 7-0 record as a starter and completed 62 percent of his passes for 1,295 yards and 10 touchdowns.

Writing about these athletes every day, we tend to label them as "limited public figures" and forget they have flesh-and-blood friends and family who are also affected by the written word.

The Husker football team lost a leader and a friend. The town of Goodland, Kan., lost a local hero as well. And most importantly, the Berringer family lost a brother and a son.

Although the column overall was meant in jest, the references to Berringer were sincerely meant to demonstrate the unfairness of Berringer's life being taken before its time.

Instead, they came across as tasteless and painful.

To the Berringer family and the people of Goodland, the Collegian staff would like to sincerely apologize for words that might have seemed disrespectful to Berringer's memory.

We strive to put out the most professional publication as possible. We deal with making difficult editorial decisions daily.

The appearance of the questionable phrases referring to Berringer does not represent one of our better decisions, and for that, we are sorry.

Thoughts from a walk in the cemetery clover

Our true calling is to seek truth and understanding, but not for ourselves

KRIS EMMONS/Collegian

The cemetery clover, soft beneath my bare feet, stands in sharp relief to the monuments of death all around me. I have come here to think about my life.

The clover, so green and filled with life, seems to mock my own morose thoughts.

When will it end?

This throbbing pain overwhelms me at times, threatening to suck the very life from my body.

I often feel a kinship with those who have passed on before me. I walk in the cemetery clover because I often feel dead myself.

They are dead on the outside.

I feel dead on the inside.

Often times, it feels as if I could lie down and let my body join my heart in death. I sometimes just do not want to live anymore.

My faith in Jesus does not depend on what I am feeling at any given time in this crazy world. If it did, there would be but one result possible — I would have been dead long ago.

Quite honestly, apart from my faith, I see very little reason to live. Looked at closely, life itself has very little meaning apart from Christ.

Physically, we are born to die.

From the moment of birth, we march in lock-step towards impending death. I have sensed this in an incredible way in the last six months. After watching someone I love step over the sill of eternity, I have begun to contemplate my own life and imminent death.

So I walk in the cemetery clover.

And my heart ponders things my words simply cannot express. These ponderings lead me down yet another winding road of the soul.

I have corresponded with many people who have asserted that humans have risen from nothing and have nothing to look forward to beyond this fleeting life. As I stand looking at the grave of a man named Heintzelman, I wonder if this is true, why do we care? Why would where we came from even merit a passing thought?

If we arise from nothing more than a random combination of a sperm and an egg, and we return to nothing more than dust, our searchings for truth are futile. If we came from nothing, and return to nothing, then it would seem that nothing really matters.

To even think upon subjects of such importance as our origins and destinies allows us to see beyond the grave to a grander purpose, which I now contemplate.

For me, that grander purpose is found not only in death, but in life itself.

In life, we are given the unmistakably clear opportunity to share our hope with others who may not perceive any meaning in life. They may not understand that there is hope in this life and the next.

We are not just a chance meeting between a sperm and an egg. Rather, we are specially designed by a loving creator to fulfill a divine purpose. We may choose not to fulfill it, but the purpose for our lives remains the same.

These graves all around me stand as monuments to people who once lived: People who may or may not have fulfilled the divine purpose for their lives.

When another young man from another time period stands in my own cemetery clover, I want him to look at a monument to a man who sought the divine purpose for his life. I want him to see a monument to a life that was not lost in the abyss of hopelessness, but rather was raised above the futility of life without Jesus.

The apostle Paul said, "Christ means everything to me in this life, and when I die I'll have so much more.(Philippians 1:21).

To me, Paul is saying, "I would rather die and be with Jesus. But, if I live, he lives through me, as I share his hope with others."

As I live this life — so hopeless without Jesus — I want to share the hope that I have found with others. Truly, that is the divine purpose for all of our lives — sharing hope with the hopeless world around us. Often, I share from a heart full of grief or pain, but always the hope remains. I can now understand that all hope is not gone. We are not but mere animals, meant to simply live and die. We do have a grander purpose and a higher calling.

That calling is to seek truth and understanding. Not for our own sake, however. Rather, we should seek these purposes for the sake of knowing the keeper of all truth in an intimate way.

So, I stand in the cemetery clover.

Hot image of 1940s Wichita overtaken by suburbia

Former baby boom generation moved to towns like Wichita and Kansas City

If, in the past 100 years, Kansans have flocked to the central commercial centers of the state — mainly Wichita and the megalopolis of the Kansas City-Topeka corridor — the past 25 years have been about flocking out.

It was World War II that drew thousands to Wichita to work in the vast factories of Boeing and Beech.

My grandmother, who lived more than 100 miles south of Wichita, moved there during the war when my grandfather was in Europe fixing tanks. She took a job with Beech Aircraft as a secretary.

RUSSELL FORTMEYER

RUSSELL FORTMEYER is a senior in architectural engineering. You can send e-mail to Russell at rmf@ksu.edu

She tells me stories of seeing Frank Sinatra, before his superstardom, singing ballads at the Orpheum Theater. Or how, in the 1940s, Beech, always on Webb Road and now in the middle of suburbia, was in the country. She tells me how she and her friends would go to USO dances in Wichita and as far north as Salina, Kan., just to dance with a soldier.

With these stories, I've always had a glamorous concept of Wichita in the late 1930s and 1940s as a place of hot music and energy, a place as riveting and pulsing as the sounds of aircraft construction.

However, when Grandpa came back, a little hardened by the war, they married and moved back to the farm, Grandma leaving her high-faluting city life and modern friends behind.

And in some ways, so did Wichita itself. While thousands stayed at the factories and built city lives in new neighborhoods, only a relative minority left the cities to pursue agriculture again. And yet many more who stayed have poured into suburbs, vacating the city and institutions they helped to build.

Slowly, the small towns of agrarian Kansas began to dry up. The Baby Boom generation were more willing to move around the country, to seek out a new life and style. In Kansas, many of them moved to Wichita and Kansas City or Dallas and Denver. But is that pattern changing, even subtly?

Kansas is experiencing a population shift much like Los Angeles (my favorite city of the future for comparison) did in the early 20th century.

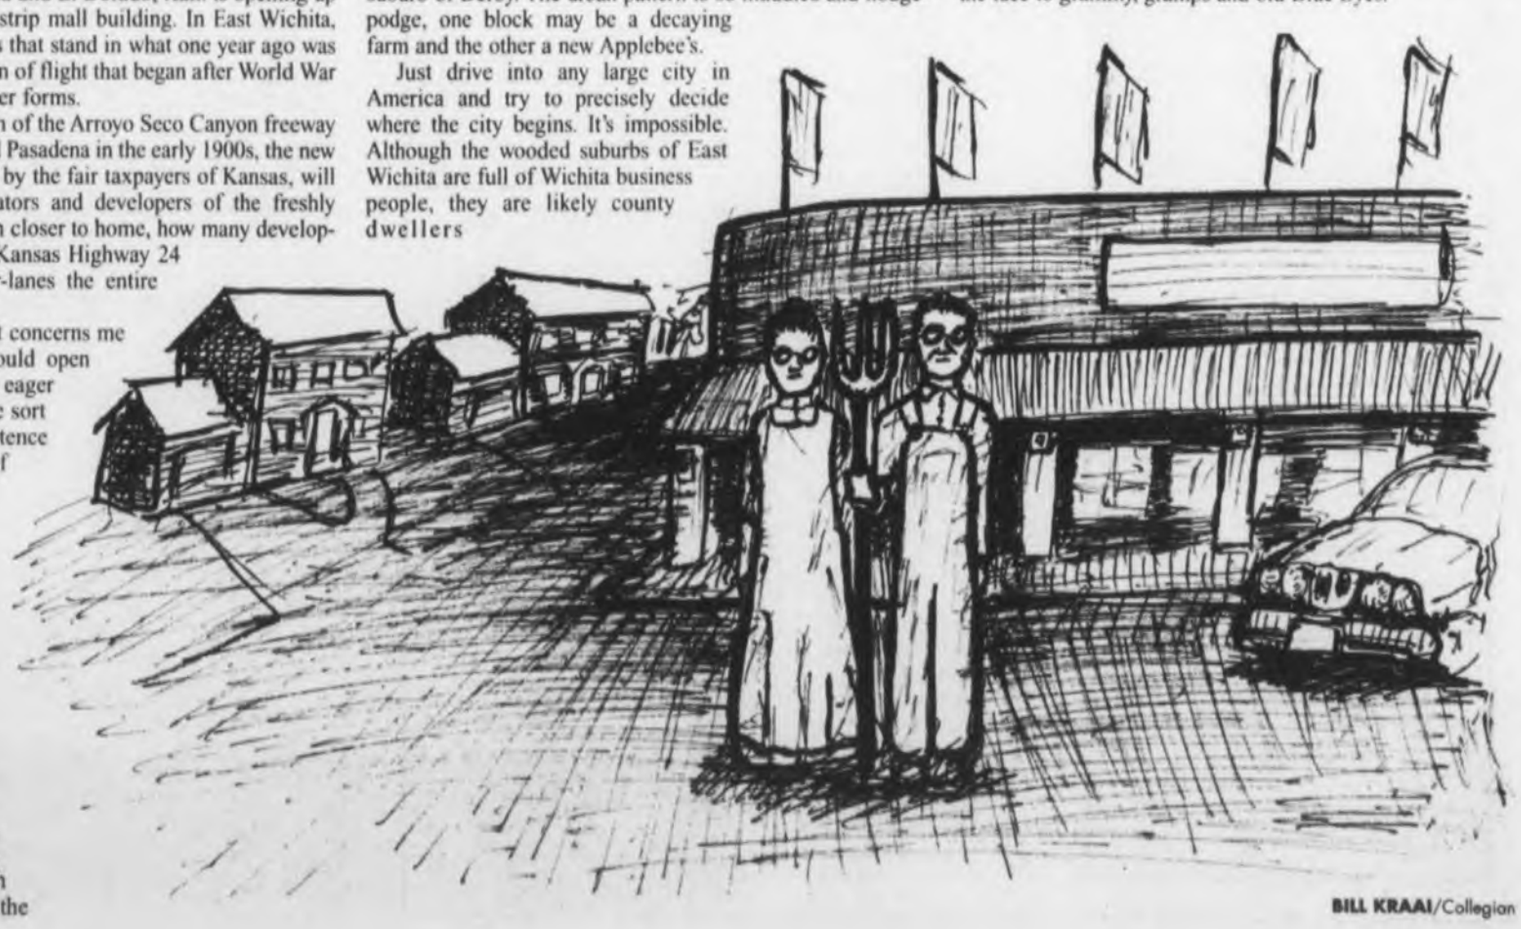
Take El Dorado, Kan., a small city of only 13,000 that boomed in the early 1900s, and busted in the 1970s, with oil. Consider El Dorado to be the sister of Pasadena, Calif., with Wichita filling in as Los Angeles.

Between the two cities is farmland and a few smaller towns, but that is quickly changing. The new four-lane highway 254, between Wichita and El Dorado, Kan. is opening up a corridor of home and strip mall building. In East Wichita, there are executive hotels that stand in what one year ago was pasture land. The tradition of flight that began after World War II continues today, in other forms.

Much like the creation of the Arroyo Seco Canyon freeway between Los Angeles and Pasadena in the early 1900s, the new highway 254, subsidized by the fair taxpayers of Kansas, will benefit the land speculators and developers of the freshly available farmland. Much closer to home, how many developers would benefit from Kansas Highway 24 being converted to four-lanes the entire route?

As an El Doradoan, it concerns me that a super-corridor would open up the city to Wichitans eager to flee their city for some sort of mythical country existence with access to a golf course. It's not a question of being pro- or anti-development, it's a question of how it will be done.

If the city council of El Dorado and the Butler County Commission weren't so hungry for new business and new sources of revenue, they wouldn't be so willing to sacrifice the stable future of the county for short-term, trash growth that forever alters the urban landscape.



Cities begin to make no sense. Just visit Andover, Kan., which abuts East Wichita and has been welcoming suburbanites with open arms. It's one of the modern breed of Kansas cities with absolutely no downtown or historic core, just a collection of strip malls, big brick church barns and housing additions.

It's already happened south of Wichita in the working-class suburb of Derby. The urban pattern is so muddled and hodge-podge, one block may be a decaying farm and the other a new Applebee's.

Just drive into any large city in America and try to precisely decide where the city begins. It's impossible. Although the wooded suburbs of East Wichita are full of Wichita business people, they are likely county dwellers — safely detached from the city and its school system.

In 30 years, Kansas Highway 254 will surely be well-developed with new housing additions and strip malls (i.e. Johnson County style), just like Highway 24 is beginning to appear. We'll just need to insert a Barnes and Noble superstore to finish off the death of the countryside.

So this exodus from Kansas cities isn't so much a return to the agrarian existence of our ancestral heritage as it is a slap in the face to grammy, gramps and old Blue Eyes.

Scientists create more disease resilient wheat

ANDREA COREY
staff writer

K-State scientists are trying to determine what makes wheat wheat — on the cellular level.

The scientists are trying to map out the genetics that make up wheat, not only to find out more about the grass, but also as part of the process involved in making a more disease-resistant plant.

"You can control diseases also by using chemicals, but you know, it's a mess. It costs money. It pollutes the environment," said Bernd Friebe, a research professor in plant pathology.

Friebe said controlling a plant's resistance to disease by altering its genetics is better than using chemicals.

"The only reasonable way to control diseases and get a safe crop is to use genetic resistance, he said."

In the lab, Friebe and lab workers try to use chemicals to cut genes out of one chromosome so they can eventually paste that gene into another. The process seems much like cutting and pasting on a computer screen, only far more difficult.

The process allows a wheat characteristic, like resistance to a disease, to be pasted onto the genetic code of another kind of wheat.

Though one of the goals of this project is to isolate genes that help fight disease, the other goal may seem less applicable. The scientists want to know more about wheat.

"As a child I always wanted to be a scientist," said Bikram Gill, university distinguished professor and director of the Wheat Genetics Resource Center.

For Gill, part of his attraction to science is about discovery.

"The excitement — you're the first person to see this thing for the first time — there is no feeling in the world like that, he said."

Gill has spent most of his life with wheat. He grew up on a wheat farm in Punjab, India, and has studied wheat at K-State for 18 years.

He has been working on the wheat genome project for more than 10 years, and said the project is getting more and more involved. In fact, he said it may only be half over.

"It's going to take another 10 years or more," he said.

The reason the project will take so long is that separating genes is a highly complex process.

Scientists have to map the seven chromosome groups that form the genetic material of wheat. Seven universities around the world — five in the United States, one in France and one in Australia — each received one chromosome to study. K-State got chromosome five.

Each team then has to figure out what some of the genes in each chromosome do, but they have to find the genes first.

That's where Justin Faris, a doctoral student in genetics, enters the picture. He said the team has a rough reference map made so far and that the team is trying to use the present map to discover more genes so a more detailed map can be made.

Faris explained that finding a gene on a chromosome can be difficult because there is a large amount of DNA, and not all of it has a function like a gene does.

"Out of the 16 billion base pairs, 85 percent is that highly repetitive kind of DNA that has an unknown function," he said.

Faris said DNA replicates itself more and becomes more active on some parts of the chromosome, and said he hypothesizes that genes can be found by looking for a higher level of activity.

Classroom technology aids students, teachers

JENNI EVANS
staff reporter

The increased use of technology can be seen across the campus in a variety of different ways. Teachers are using more interactive teaching methods that help students to learn.

Principles of Biology is the first course at K-State to use a "studio model." The class incorporates the use of technology, building interaction between students and their lab partners, in conjunction with the faculty members teaching the course.

"One of the main ideas here is that students will get to actively participate in their education," Mark Decker, assistant professor of biology, said.

Decker was hired to help develop the course and to create interactive material, which will help students learn the aspects of biology.

"The new technology used in biology is not only more creative, but it's a better learning style for me. Using the computers helps keep my attention, and I learn better interacting with the computer," Stacey Howe, sophomore in arts and sciences, said.

Nine of 21 large lecture rooms across campus have also been remodeled and updated to incorporate technology into the curriculum.

The main advantage of these classrooms is better student learning and a better working environment for faculty.

"The faculty role is critical. Not only do they have to create that knowledge base and learning environment, but now they get the exciting and very difficult role of talking to students and challeng-

McDonald making presence known

▶RECEIVER USES NEBRASKA GAME to help increase playing time.

SUN DEE MILLS
sports editor

Darnell who?

If the 5-yard touchdown pass that Wildcat wide receiver Darnell McDonald caught at the beginning of the Bowling Green game's fourth quarter doesn't ring a bell, think back to Nebraska.

In the third quarter, on a drive to score the Cats' second touchdown of the game, quarterback Michael Bishop hooked up with McDonald for a 42-yard completion at the Nebraska 26-yard line.

And, with 49 seconds to go in the game and the conclusion forgone, Bishop again connected with McDonald. This time, a 21-yard reception for a touchdown.

The group of six true wideouts have caught a combined 17 passes for a total of 432 yards. McDonald himself is third on the list, catching only the three above mentioned passes for 68 yards. But he admits he hasn't seen the field that much — yet.

"For the first couple weeks, I didn't do as well at practice, and I didn't get as much playing time," McDonald said.

But the sidelines are a big motivator, so McDonald kicked it into gear.

"I'm starting to step up my practice habits, and he's (Coach Bill Snyder) started putting me on the field a little more," he said. "It's helping me get a little more confidence, so I can perform better."

Transferring from Garden City Community College hasn't been a cake walk for McDonald. The adjustments to coaching styles have been numerous, but McDonald said they're helping him grow.

"With a coach like Bill Snyder, you've got to do every little teeny thing right," he said. "In a way, I kind of dislike that, but in the long run, I feel that it'll help me be a little more responsible."

Whether McDonald is a favorite target of Bishop remains to be seen. McDonald, however, enjoys being on the receiving end.

"I think it's a lot easier catching a ball when Bishop throws it, because it's coming 90 miles an hour right at your chest," he said. "You have no reason not to catch it, or it's just going to take your chest off. I love the way he throws the ball."

Don't think McDonald only likes catching Bishop's passes. He also has the utmost respect for quarterback Jonathan Beasley.

"Beasley's more of a touch passer," he said. "He doesn't throw as hard as Bishop, but he's very accurate. Beasley's like a John Elway — he can sit in the pocket and just pick people apart."

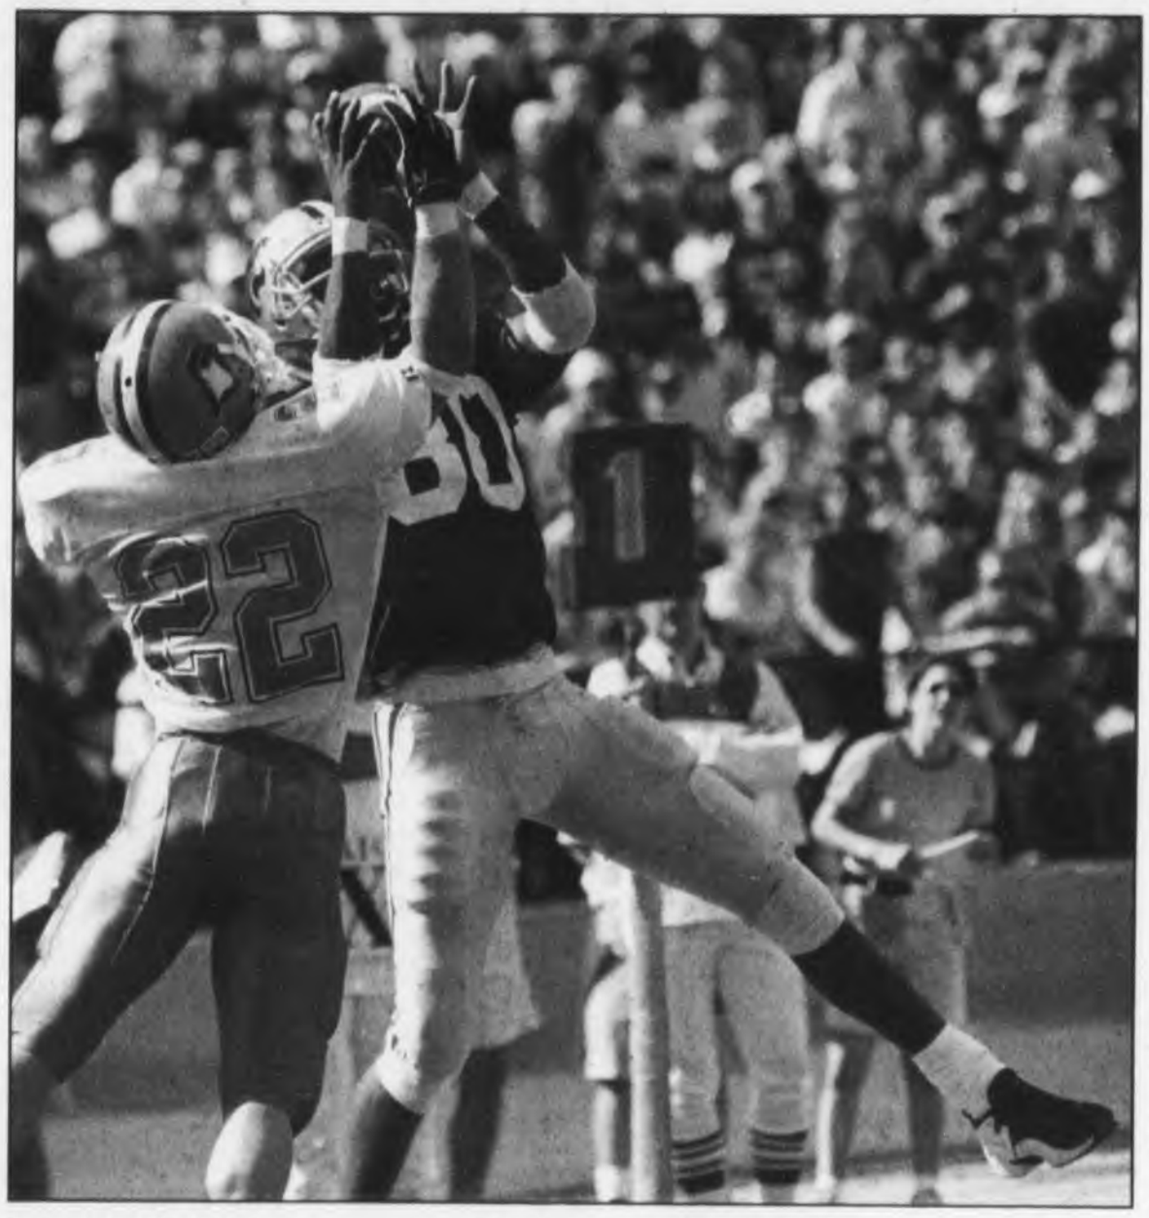
McDonald admitted Nebraska picked apart the Cats' running game, something that doesn't make his job any easier.

"It's always hard for the receiving core when the running game doesn't work," he said.

But getting the passing game going consistently gave the Cats problems as well.

"At one second, everything will be going right with your passing game, and then the next series it just doesn't work," McDonald said. "Nebraska can do that to you. If we'd have kept it going, I think it would have been a lot closer game."

Snyder said he's still waiting for a wide receiver to lead the pack.



"I don't think anybody is stepping up and taking command," Snyder said. "They work at it, and they are making the effort now. They are making progress."

The wide receiving core concerned Snyder and the fans, and McDonald is completely aware of that.

"I think it's bringing the receiving core together real tight," he said. "We don't have anyone to lean against right now. It's just the receiving core."

Not to fear, McDonald said. The successes of the passing game at Nebraska gave McDonald and his teammates hope for future games.

"With Bishop throwing perfect strikes, I think we'll be able to come together, and then the fans will be behind us 100 percent by the end of the year," he said.

WILDCAT REPORT

COMPILED BY STAFF AND WIRE REPORTS

TICKETS REMAIN FOR MU GAME

A few hundred tickets still remain for the Wildcats' home football game Saturday with the Missouri Tigers. Tickets can be purchased for the Family Weekend game from the K-State Athletics Ticket Office at Bramlage Coliseum or by calling (800) 221-CATS.

The game time for the Saturday game vs. Missouri has been changed to 11:30 a.m. to accommodate television. The game will be televised on the Big 12 syndicated package. It can be seen locally on WIBW-TV from Topeka (TCI channel 3).

HOMECOMING GAME UPDATE

The Oct. 18 home football game with Texas A&M has been chosen to be televised regionally by ABC Sports. Because of this, kickoff has been changed to 2:30 p.m.

Homecoming activities for Oct. 18 will not be affected. The parade is scheduled to start at 9 a.m. as scheduled.

A few hundred tickets remain for the game and can be purchased from the K-State Athletics Ticket Office or by calling (800) 221-CATS.

NETWORK AFFILIATE CHANGING

The Kansas City radio affiliate on the Wildcat Sports Network, WHB, will be trading frequencies with KCMO, starting Oct. 8. WHB will be found at 810 AM, while KCMO will move to 710 AM. The first football game affected will be Saturday's game with Missouri.

EX-CAT JOINS TEAMUP PROGRAM

Former K-State basketball standout Rolando Blackman will be a spokesman for the NBA TeamUp program, a leaguewide initiative encouraging youth volunteerism.

Blackman will speak with students in grades 6-12 about the importance of improving their communities through service projects. Using the TEAM acronym — Teamwork, Effort, Attitude and Motivation — he will draw attention to ways young people can learn and develop through volunteer activities.

Throughout his career, Blackman was dedicated to community service. He served as vice-president of the National Board of Directors for the Muscular Dystrophy Association and as co-chairman of the MDA Miles of Smiles Campaign from 1987 to 1992. In addition, he has worked with a number of Dallas-based organizations and has been honored by the National Basketball Players Association, the Special Olympics, and the Boys and Girls Club of America. In recognition of his work, Brooklyn's Ditmas Park, where Blackman learned to play basketball, was renamed Rolando Blackman Park in 1987.

Now in its second year, the NBA TeamUp program is the league's primary outreach initiative dedicated to youth and education. Program components include a leaguewide awareness day, motivational visits by NBA players and representatives, a youth service award, the NBA TeamUp Celebration, educational materials, and public service announcements.

WOMEN'S BASKETBALL TEAM AMONG NATION'S ELITE

The K-State women's basketball team is among the best in the nation off the court. The Women's Basketball Coaches Association announced its 1997 Academic Top-25 Team Honor Roll, recognizing the nation's highest NCAA Division I team grade point averages for the 1996-97 season, based upon nominations submitted by member coaches.

K-State was eighth in the nation with a 3.337 team grade point average and was the only Big 12 school in the top 25. La Salle University was the No. 1 school with a 3.501 GPA.

ASSISTANT COACH TO BE HONORED

Greg Peterson, K-State wide receivers coach and passing game coordinator, will be inducted Saturday into the Nebraska Wesleyan University Athletic Hall of Fame.

He is a 1984 graduate of Nebraska Wesleyan and was a letterwinner in both football and basketball. He earned All-Nebraska Intercollegiate Athletic Conference honors twice for basketball. He became an All-America wide receiver and set school records for career receptions (105) and receiving yards (1,705) in just two seasons.

BOWLING TEAM FALLS TO OKLAHOMA

The K-State Bowling team went to Norman, Okla., to battle the Sooners in a nine-game set.

K-State lost the first seven games, all head-to-head games, despite a highlight of Martin Rosa converting a 6-7-10 split.

Games eight and nine were in the Baker System format. K-State took advantage of four open frames to win game eight 176-158. In the ninth game, the Cats put together eight consecutive strikes to blow out the Sooners 246-144.

K-State will travel to Kansas City Oct. 24 and 25 to compete in the Midstates Intercollegiate Bowling Tournament at the NKC Pro Bowl for its first intercollegiate tournament.

Kansas City Chiefs release wide receiver Perriman; K-State's Lockett could see more playing time

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — On Tuesday, the Kansas City Chiefs waived Brett Perriman after the wide receiver made just six catches since signing as a free agent.

The Chiefs had announced earlier they had acquired linebacker Wayne Simmons from the Green Bay Packers. Perriman had been signed along with Andre Rison to give new quarterback Elvis Grbac two formidable targets along with Tony Gonzalez, the tight end who was the team's first-round draft choice.

Lockett

But Perriman suffered a severe hamstring injury and missed most of training camp.

"Unfortunately, he was not able to provide us with those things in his performance that we had hoped for," said Chiefs president Carl Peterson.

Grbac and Rison immediately hit it off, and Perriman had grown increasingly unhappy as it became clear most of the passing attack would be directed to Rison.

Rison, who caught a 54-yard pass for Green Bay's first touchdown in the Super Bowl, played in a similar offense in Green Bay as the Chiefs run, and he and Grbac, who learned the offense in San Francisco, immediately clicked.

Perriman, a second-round pick of the New Orleans Saints out of Miami in 1988, signed with the Chiefs after six seasons with Detroit, in which he became the Lions' all-time leading receiver with 428 catches.

Perriman ranks second on the Lions all-time list with 5,272 yards.

The Chiefs say receiver Lake Dawson has almost recovered from the knee injury he suffered early last year and is ready to assume an active role. Kansas City has also been impressed with the play of Kevin Lockett, the second-round draft choice from K-State.

Alomar brothers to face off in playoffs

ASSOCIATED PRESS

BALTIMORE — Alomar vs. Alomar isn't a divorce proceeding. It's becoming an annual ritual in the American League playoffs.

Last year, Roberto's spitting incident dominated the first-round series, when Baltimore beat Cleveland in four games. This time, it's Sandy's bat that's getting the attention as the Indians and Orioles prepare for Wednesday night's start to the AL championship series.

Alomar definitely is going to the World Series. Their family hasn't told them which one it's rooting for.

"Ask my mom and dad that when they're here tomorrow," Sandy said as the Indians worked out Tuesday at Camden Yards. "And I want to know what the answer is. Tell me the truth."

"There's been all kind of stuff, good and bad," Sandy said after hitting the game-winning homer at the All-Star game and winning the MVP award. "We're a good family. We're a baseball family. We do the best we can do to put baseball up there."

It's been a season of role reversal. Sandy was healthy, catching 100 games in consecutive seasons for the first time and setting career highs with a .324 average, 21 homers and 83 RBIs.

And then there was that game-tying, eighth-inning homer in Game 4 against the New York Yankees on Sunday night, saving the Indians from elimination.

"You tend to look at his offensive statistics, bu the way he has developed and helped our pitchin staff and his game-calling has helped us win ball games as much as his offense," said Indians manag er Mike Hargrove.

"The only reason this season is fun is becaus we're winning," Roberto said. "From my persona view, it hasn't been fun because I haven't been abl to be out there the way I want every day. It's jus something you have to deal with. Injuries come witl playing the game. It's part of the game. Maybe it' sending me a message to prepare myself stronge next year."

Baltimore, favored to beat the Indians after win ning in an upset last year, starts Scott Erickson (16 7) in the opener against Chad Ogea (8-9).

With Cleveland trying for its second straight Al pennant, Roberto Alomar hit a game-tying single of Jose Mesa in the ninth inning of Game 4, then hit go-ahead homer off Mesa in the 12th.

Baltimore, which won an AL-best 98 games, i seeking its first pennant since 1983.

After beating Cleveland as the wild card tean last year, the Orioles lost to the Yankees in fiv games.

With the Orioles battling the Yankees to sign fre agents in the offseason, then fighting them for th AL East title all year, a rematch in the league cham pionship series had seemed probable to many.

It's a forgone conclusion: Atlanta to conquer Baltimore in 1997 World Series

Wildcat football.

Now that I have your attention (From what I've been told, nine times out of 10, if those two words appear in a lead paragraph, K-Staters will read the story.), I'd like to turn the topic to the 1997 Major League Baseball World Champions, the Atlanta Braves.

Before I get accused of jumping on any bandwagons, let's just talk about why this is a forgone conclusion.

It's called failure.

In 1990, after trading two-time MVP Dale Murphy and posting baseball's worst record, the Braves responded by reaching the Big Game just one short year later.

Failure motivates.

No, the Braves haven't failed much this decade. Only when it counts.

Since 1991, the team has only taken home the big trophy once. It has taken home three little ones in that time span.

By anyone else's standards, that might be OK. Reaching the World Series four years out of seven is a pretty good statistic. But now that fans expect a playoff showing, the heat is on.

(Not that Wildcat fans know anything about this.)

It's not good enough when fans think their team is ready to compete in the most meaningful game of the season, and are disappointed with the result.

(Anyone out there relating to this?)

It's not good enough when a team boasts the best bullpen in the major leagues, with Cy Young winners Greg Maddux, Tom Glavine, John Smoltz and the 1997 National League-leading, 20-game winning Denny Neagle, yet loses the 1996 Series in six games to the New York Yankees.

And it's not good enough when in 1996, the team posts the best batting average in 13 years and the third-most homers in team history and still can't take home the toy in the Cracker Jacks.

There's no way the Braves will let that happen again this year.

With something to prove, the Braves will move fairly quickly past the Florida Marlins to their American League competitors, the Baltimore Orioles.

And why will the Braves prevail? Simple — the bullpen.

The Orioles face the Cleveland Indians for the American League Championship Series. And my guess is the Orioles will make quick work of the Indians, for reasons that would take up another entire column.

The Indians, with the fewest wins of any American League playoff team at 86-75, snuck by the 1996 World Champion New York Yankees because they had something to prove, as well.

The Indians finished second to the Yanks five times in the 1950s. And even though the Indians won a record 111 games in 1954, another New York team took them in the series, the New York Giants.

Nevertheless, the Indians will not be the Braves' victim in this year's series, mark my words.

I have consulted the prediction swamie who's been helping me with my college football picks. I haven't been steered too wrong so far, but take it with a grain of salt.

This is what you will see in this year's Braves-Orioles matchup:

Because the Braves have the better record of 101-61, the series will begin at the Coca-Cola haven of Turner Field. The Orioles' Mike Mussina will take the mound vs. 1997 National League Cy Young winner Maddux. Mussina will have a dominant first game, but the Braves' offensive group of Javier Lopez, Chipper Jones, Ryan Klesko and Jeff Blauser will pound away at the Orioles pitching staff during the second game.

In the third game at Camden Yards, Roberto Alomar will eliminate any negative thoughts remaining from last season's postseason spitting incident with a tremendous offensive performance.

But the Braves' powerful bullpen will outlast the Orioles, and in six games, the Braves will get the big one.

No way will the Braves fail to take that trophy home. You can bank on it. And if you win any money off the prediction, it can be sent to Kedzie 116, in care of the swamie. The swamie will thank you. And so will I.

6 arrested for conspiracy

ASSOCIATED PRESS

PEARL, Miss. — Six teens were arrested Tuesday on murder conspiracy charges, apparently related to the rampage last week in which a boy allegedly stabbed his mother to death and then opened fire on schoolmates, killing two and wounding seven.

Police Chief Bill Slade announced the arrests this afternoon but declined to discuss what led lawmen to the teen-agers. One of the six is a close friend of the suspect in last week's slayings, but Slade wouldn't confirm any connection.

The six, held in the Rankin County jail, are each charged with conspiracy to commit murder. They entered innocent pleas at an initial appearance this afternoon in city court.

"I will not get into details of the investigation. We are still conducting an investigation. That's all I can say," Slade said.

Already in custody is Luke Woodham, 16, who was arrested at the school last Wednesday morning.

Woodham is accused of walking into a crowded courtyard area and shooting his former girlfriend, then turning his rifle on bystanders. By the time he drove off, two students lay dead, and seven were wounded.

A few hours earlier, police say, he had stabbed his mother to death at their home. He has pleaded innocent to three counts of murder and seven counts of aggravated assault.

Three of the six were taken into custody at Pearl High School.

Slade identified those arrested as Woodham's friend Justin James Sledge, 16; Delbert Shaw, 18; Wesley Brownell, 17; Daniel Thompson, 16; and Donald Brooks, 17, all of Pearl; and Grant Boyett, 18, of Brandon, who attends Hinds Community College.

Three of the six were arrested at the school.

Last week, Sledge provided news organizations with what he claimed was a document allegedly written by Woodham, in which the youth claimed to have planned the killings. He claimed Woodham gave him the papers on the morning of the shooting.

Sledge had been suspended from school Monday after school officials said he was disruptive at a candlelight vigil held for the victims.

Texas man kills 2 women, self

ASSOCIATED PRESS

SAN ANTONIO — A man angry at his ex-girlfriend opened fire with a rifle Tuesday at the paging company where she worked, killing her and another woman before shooting himself to death.

Charles Lee White, 42, was found dead along with his former girlfriend, Pamela Henry, 38, and Juanita Morin, 41, when a police SWAT team stormed the front doors of ProtoCall, where the two women worked.

Another ProtoCall employee was hospitalized in critical condition with a gunshot wound to the head.

According to police, Henry had called authorities Monday night and said White was threatening her and had taken the spark plug wires from her car so it wouldn't run. Ms. Henry told police White had a bad temper and that she was very afraid of him.

"The officer who responded to the call strongly advised the woman against going to work this morning," said police Sgt. Ernest Celaya. "But obviously she didn't heed that advice."

During the rampage, a woman who worked for a separate business sharing the same office with ProtoCall escaped injury by hiding under her desk.

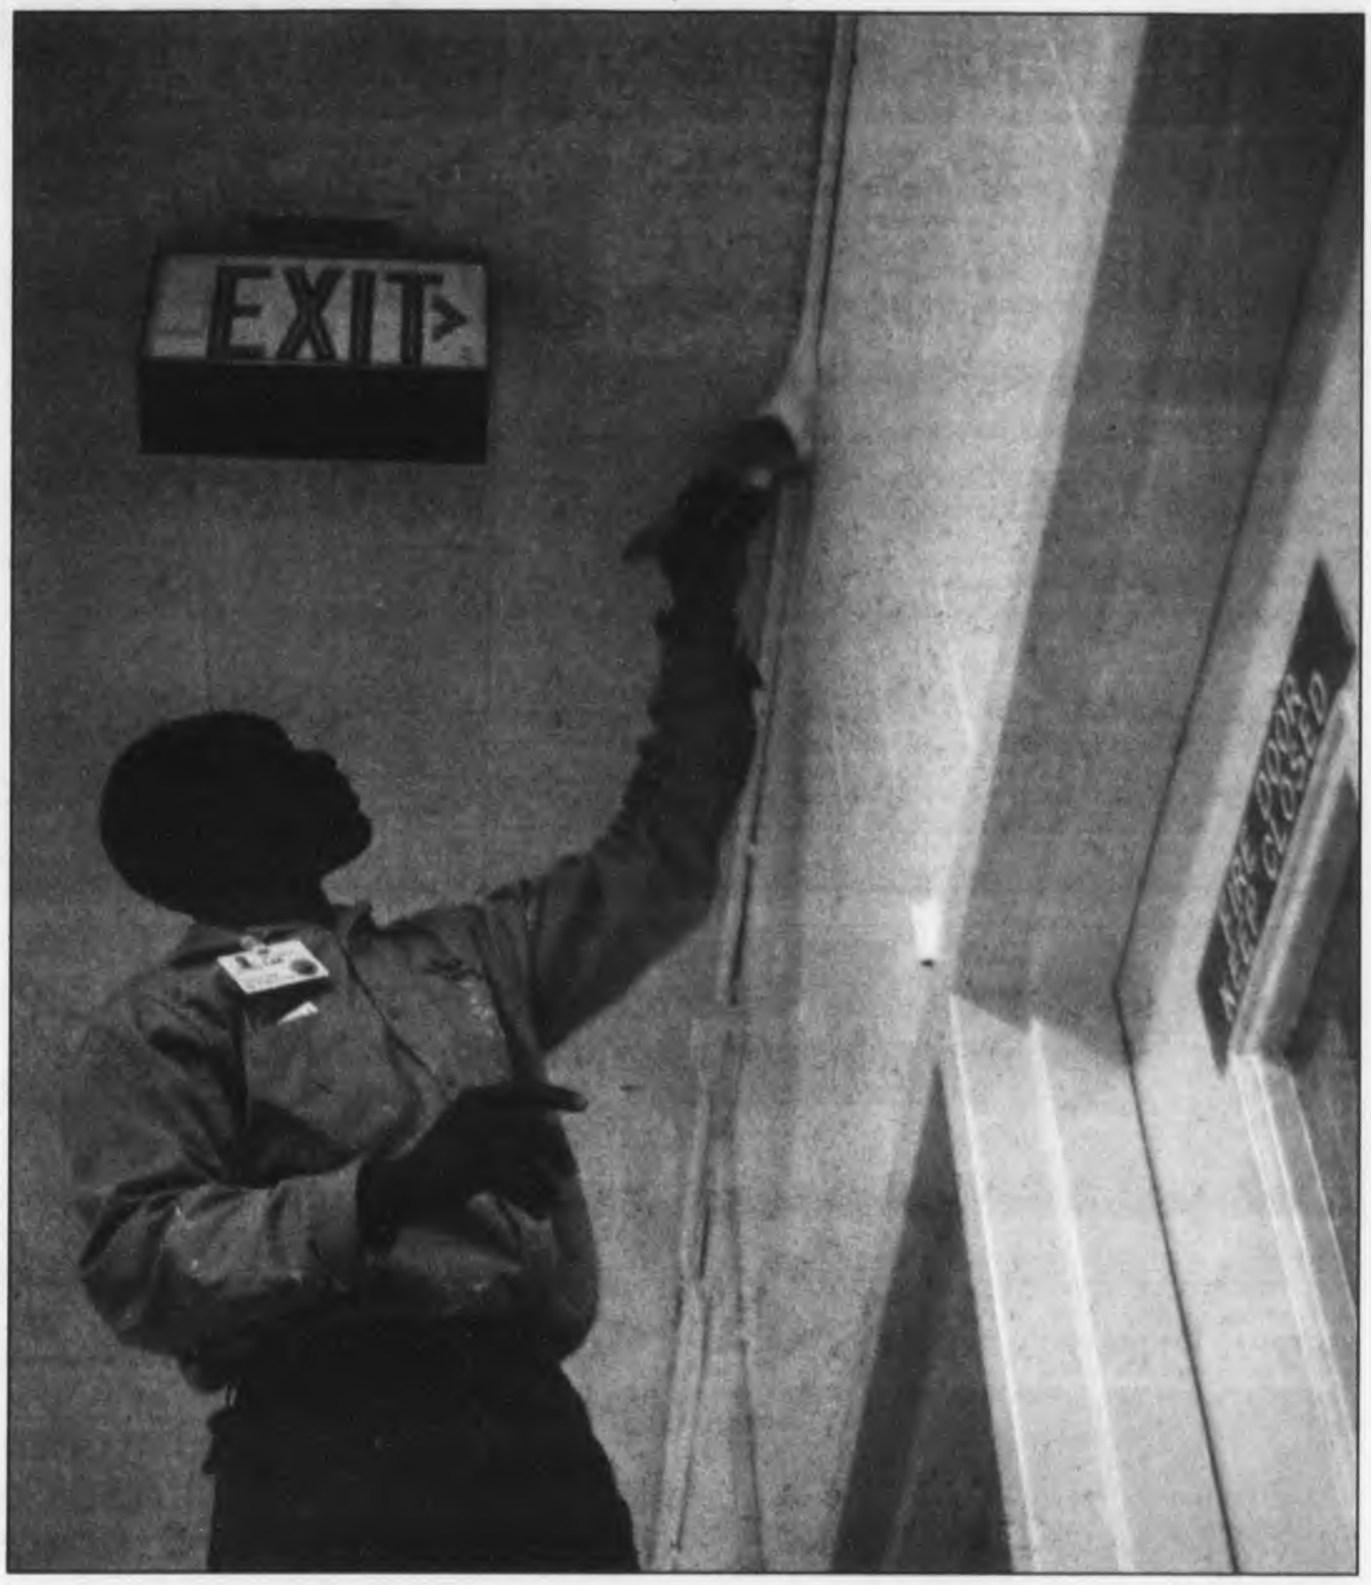
ing them to think and then analyze what's coming back," said Beth Unger, vice provost for Academic Services and Technology and Dean of Continuing Education.

Unger hopes that the remaining 12 large lecture rooms will be updated to the "common core" classroom in two to three years.

The common core classroom consists of several hardware and software items. These include a projection system, and ELMO or JVC visual presenter, a SVHS VCR and preview monitor.



"We're moving from this old industrial model of lecture back to an artisan model of mentoring and tutors," Unger said.

The cost of the physical construction ranges depending on the condition of the classroom. The money used for physical construction is money that is allocated to the university for physical plant maintenance but cannot be used for technology.

The cost of these renovations range from $42,000 to $43,000 for technology, funded entirely through the provost's office.

Finding the money to add the technology has been a challenge, Unger said.

"We're not focused on technology. We're focused on learning and on our students. We want students who come out of here really can perform in the workplace and do excellent research and go on for graduate degrees. Quite frankly, they're going to be the leaders in the world," Unger said.

Audit finds no violations

Stovall

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA, Kan. — Attorney General Carla Stovall has not violated Kansas' conflict of interest law by awarding outside contracts for legal work to friends and political contributors, but it can be perceived as favoritism, the Legislative Post Division said.

"While such contract awards don't fall under the definition of conflict of interest contained in state law, they can create at least the appearance of favoritism," the auditors reported.

The Legislative Post Audit Committee was presented the report at its meeting Monday in Ulysses in southwest Kansas.

In responding to the audit, Stovall said she could have predicted the audit's findings on the day the work began.

"No evidence of wrongdoing or conflict of interest in the manner in which I have awarded legal contracts exists."

One of the firms Stovall hired to represent the state was Entz & Chanay of Topeka, her former law firm. The firm and its members contributed $6,442 to her campaign. It was named local counsel in the state's legal battle with tobacco companies.

Stovall argued that the cases were awarded to outside counsel because they could best represent Kansas, not as political payoffs.

"When selecting outside legal counsel for a person or agency, I think only of one thing, the client," she said in her audit response.

Auditors looked at 35 cases where Stovall had contracted with 29 private law firms to defend the state. In those cases, 20 of the 29 firms had made contributions to her campaign, ranging from $50 to about $6,500.

Those 20 firms received 27 of the 35 contracts.

Half of those firms also contributed to Stovall's opponent in either the primary or general election. Also, members of 75 other firms and about 140 other attorneys contributed to her 1994 campaign but got no business from her.

Auditors recommended that the attorney general's office establish "reasonable procedures to ensure that its contracting process is as open as possible."

Symposium to address education issues

JULIE LINDAMOOD
staff reporter

There's more to education than reading, writing and arithmetic, Lindsay Brinkley, senior in elementary education and special education.

"There are situations in classrooms we are supposed to know how to handle," Brinkley said. "Without real experiences, it's very hard to learn what solutions will work when faced with a dilemma."

K-State's students majoring in education will have the opportunity to gain knowledge from others' real world experiences during the 1997 Education Symposium, said Heidi Hartman, symposium committee chair and senior in secondary education.

"We get into a closed atmosphere when we go to college and get separated from what it's really like in the classroom," Hartman said. "I think the symposium helps students get more insight into the classroom from a teacher's perspective."

The symposium is from 8 a.m. to 3:20 p.m. today on the second floor of the K-State Student Union.

"Participating in the symposium will help me in the future when I become a teacher because I will have gotten ideas from people who have already experienced it," Brinkley said.

Amy Stout, College of Education coordinator, said there are different sessions and topics students can choose from so they can get ideas from educators about teaching. Some issues being addressed include sexual harassment in the classroom, gangs in schools, magnet schools and leadership training.

"It's a professional development tool," Stout said, a tool Brinkley said she hopes will help her when faced with real classroom situations next year.

"It's a unique opportunity to discover if what I'm taught in the classroom really works," Brinkley said.

College of Engineering announces teaching awards

COLE EHMKE
staff reporter

Every year the College of Engineering awards faculty with money from awards and endowed chairs for exceptional performance.

"These gifts recognize the remarkable and outstanding accomplishments of individual faculty members," Terry King, dean of the College of Engineering, said.

"Whether in the classroom or the laboratory, these faculty members are leaders in their professions, and they are deeply committed to the very best educational experiences for our students."

Among the more than $75,000 announced this fall was $5,000 for the Myers-Alford Teaching Award for excellence in teaching. Mo Hosni, associate professor in mechanical engineering, received the award.

His approach to teaching is simple.

"Listen to the students. Look at their needs and be available to them," Hosni said.

The Myers-Alford Teaching Award is unusual because it rotates between engineering and human ecology colleges. Other awards and endowed chairs stay within the college. Who receives them and the size of the award

Relief agencies still accepting aid for victims

ASSOCIATED PRESS

OKLAHOMA CITY — Donations to relief agencies aiding victims of the Oklahoma City bombing largely stopped after the first anniversary of the blast.

But a committee that coordinates the aid still gets about two dozen new requests for help at each biweekly meeting.

"We're getting new people we've never even heard of," Dan Kurtenbach, chairman of the Resource Coordinating Committee, said. Although officials have identified about 10,000 people affected by the bombing, many of those now coming forward had not asked for help before.

Many seeking help in recent months have been people who thought they could handle the stress. "It's hard to come in for services if you're a rescue worker," said Connie Schlittler, director of Project Heartland, which provides counseling. "That goes against their code."

The "new" victims manage until something such as the trial of Timothy McVeigh upsets their composure. Counselors expect another upsurge during Terry Nichols' trial, said Rosemary Brown, a spokeswoman for Project Heartland.

For others, reminders of the bombing's emotional effect can be triggered by the death of a family member, a divorce or even an explosion in a movie.

"You just don't know what triggers it," said Kristeen Hall, spokeswoman for the Red Cross in Oklahoma County.

Relief agencies are trying to lead victims toward self-sufficiency.

The Salvation Army still provides tuition, school supplies and even mortgage payments for some victims.

But counselors review cases every three months in an attempt to wean people off the rolls, said Antoinette Hinton, the charity's social services director.

Although millions of dollars remain in some charities, contributions have all but stopped since the first anniversary of the bombing.

The Community Foundation handled more than $14 million for several charities, including the Mayor's and Lieutenant Governor's Funds. Of this, $1.4 million is set aside for long-term medical care and more than $7 million for scholarships.

State Regents say they have enough contributions for the $10.5 million projected cost of scholarships.

The Red Cross retrieved the most contributions — $12.6 million in cash and $2.5 million in goods and services. The remaining $6 million is in the charity's National Disaster Relief Fund, earmarked for bombing relief.

The Red Cross, the Salvation Army and the Associated Catholic Charities all say they plan to continue bombing relief efforts for at least another year.

Parents Together offers support for troubled teenagers

Problem solver
Parents Together is a support group for parents sponsored by UFM. The group meets the second and fourth Tuesday of every month.

COLE EHMKE
staff reporter

Twice a month a group of parents gather to discuss what it's like trying to raise their teen-agers.

However, most of these teen-agers have had problems with truancy, not following rules at home, shoplifting, using drugs or having sex.

In short, they're parents of troubled teens.

The group Parents Together provides support for these parents, Linda Teener, director of UFM and leader of the group, said.

It gives frustrated parents a place to talk with each other about their problems with other parents in the same situation.

"The point of the group is that parents can find that they're not alone," Teener said. "A parent may have a kid that's just been arrested for shoplifting. An older person can explain how the situation is handled, what to expect and the consequences."

They can also suggest people to call for advice.

The group was started 2 1/2 years ago by Teener and the director of the Regional Prevention Center because there wasn't a place for parents to talk about issues like pregnancy, truancy, drugs and other issues.

The only place to go for help before the group was the mental health center.

"You kind of felt you were out there on your own," Teener said.

She said the purpose of the group is both support and education. The first session of the month is a chance for venting frustrations and the second is an educational program that deals with issues teens face. At a recent meeting, a Riley County Police Department representative showed a variety of confiscated drug paraphernalia and talked about the drug problem in Manhattan.

Other speakers have been from the county attorney's office, a short term home in Junction City and high schools that offer access to special school services.

The group is open to K-State and the community. Anyone can attend, but there are guidelines, Teener said. Two of them are that the person who comes has to be significant to the life of a teen-ager and everything is confidential.

Attendance usually is from six to eight people.

In Manhattan, around 10 percent of high school students are chronically truant according to high school counselors, Teener said.

Of about 1,800 high school students, 76 are on an intensive probation program that consists of meeting three times a week with a probation officer, random drug tests and checks of school attendance. Twenty percent are successful, while 28 percent are unsuccessfully terminated and are dropped from the program because they ended up in juvenile detention or a judge gave up on their reform. Many others stay on probation because they are caught using drugs. Some are put on conditional release.

Parents Together meets at 7 p.m. the second and fourth Tuesday of every month at UFM.

NASA astronaut Foale enjoying time with family after months in space

ASSOCIATED PRESS

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — After 41/2 difficult months on Mir, American astronaut Michael Foale reveled in the company of his family and such earthly delights as pizza and chocolate chip cookies.

"Very glad to be holding these children," a weary, but happy, Foale said late Monday, six hours after space shuttle Atlantis delivered him back to Earth.

Five-year-old Jenna and 3-year-old Ian jumped into their father's lap as soon as they saw him. She squirmed and giggled. He could barely stay awake.

"He has grown twice. You've become a rebel, rebel, rebel," Foale said, cuddling his son. "And Jenna has become a little lady — sometimes," adding the last word after she squealed with delight.

The 40-year-old, British-born astrophysicist, experiencing the tug of gravity for the first time since he rocketed away to the Russian space station in May, said he felt "not particularly heavy, but a little uncertain in terms of walking and balance."

"I probably want to get strong enough to be able to go outside and walk. That's going to be my goal for the next day," he said.

Atlantis and its seven-member crew returned from the aging space station one day late. Thick clouds had prevented the shuttle from landing Sunday evening and kept Foale in orbit for a 145th day, second among Americans to Shannon Lucid's 188-day Mir mission last year.

Shortly after Atlantis rolled to a safe stop, NASA Administrator Daniel Goldin called from Italy to welcome Foale back to the planet and congratulate him on "a wonderful job."

Foale replied he was doing fine. Several minutes later, he walked with assistance from the shuttle into an airport-style people-mover and underwent the first of many medical tests. And soon after that, he was reunited with his wife, Rhonda, and their children at NASA's crew quarters.

Waiting for him were chocolate chip cookies, as well as veggie lasagna and a pizza with everything but anchovies. He'd put in the order from orbit.

Foale moved from the battered Mir into Atlantis on Sept. 28, one day after the shuttle arrived with his replacement of a new computer, patches for holes punched in the hull by a cargo ship and other urgently needed supplies.

Another computer, for backup, and other supplies are due to arrive on an unmanned cargo ship Wednesday night. Mir's crew made room for the transporter to dock by jettisoning a garbage-laden supply ship Tuesday after repairing a clamp that prevented it from undocking Monday.

Foale's place on Mir was taken by American physician David Wolf, whose four-month stay was approved by NASA at practically the last minute following a fierce public debate about the safety of the 111/2-year-old Mir.

Some members of Congress and NASA's own inspector general were alarmed by a raging fire aboard Mir in February, the cargo-ship collision in June and frequent computer breakdowns and power losses.

Foale was visibly upset during a televised NASA interview as he recalled the aftermath of the collision. His commander at the time, Vasily Tsibliyev, had developed an irregular heartbeat from all the stress and was barred by Russia's Mission Control from taking part in an internal spacewalk to restore power to the stricken space station.

Tsibliyev was blamed, in large part, for the crash.

"He felt responsible for the whole accident," Foale said, "which I don't quite feel." The astronaut paused, shook his head and looked down. "No, this is too hard to talk about." The camera quickly panned away.

Rhonda Foale said she's relieved her husband no longer is on Mir. Yet, despite all the problems, she said he's glad he did it and so is she.

"It was really rewarding for him," she said. "I'm looking forward to hearing the stories, having communication where we can really communicate with each other with no delays and static and a thousand people listening."

Rhonda Foale has a turkey and burgers in the refrigerator at their home in Houston, ready to pop into the oven and toss onto a new gas grill. They were to take a flight this afternoon.

She is already planning a vacation for the four of them.

"Somewhere south, either Mexico or the Caribbean or the Keys," she said, "somewhere where Mike can get in the sun and the wind and the waves and splash around."

121 prairie dogs die in relocation effort

ASSOCIATED PRESS

HUTCHINSON, Kan. — A large group of prairie dogs moved from Hutchinson's Fairgrounds Park to the Quivira National Wildlife Refuge fell victim to a large population of hungry badgers.

"Unfortunately, it's not a happy story," assistant refuge manager Kathy Owens said. "The badgers put up a town right next door and basically cleaned them out. There was one prairie dog left last weekend, and as of Monday that den had been dug out by a badger. Unfortunately nature took its course."

Seventy-seven prairie dogs were captured three weeks ago at Fairgrounds Park to make room for several ball diamonds.

But rescuers didn't catch all the prairie dogs the first time. They went back and caught 24 Saturday and 2(Sunday. All were released over the weekend at Quivira.

Janet Laird, a Hutchinson resident who organized the prairie dog rescue, wept when she heard the news. Her tears quickly turned to anger, though.

"Kansas turned its back on these prairie dogs," she said. "Where we took them was not a prairie. It was a last-ditch place to put them. We worked hard to get a place for them but Topeka turned us down and Kanopolis said they couldn't be put on lake property. We finally put them at Quivira – a federal park. Kansas didn't help one bit."

Judge trims award in 'Seinfeld' lawsuit

ASSOCIATED PRESS

MILWAUKEE — The Miller Brewing Co. employee who complained after a Miller executive told her about a racy "Seinfeld" episode will not have to pay him $1.5 million in damages for getting him fired, a judge ruled. The company itself still might have to pay millions, though.

Circuit Judge Louise Tesmer on Monday dropped the punitive damages that the jury assessed in July against Patricia Best, who had lodged the complaint against Jerold Mackenzie.

The judge also reduced the award against Robert Smith, a Miller vice president, from more than $500,000 to $100,000.

A $24.5 million judgment against Miller itself, including more than $17 million in punitive damages, remains in place pending further appeal.

Attorneys for Miller, Best and Smith had argued that the jury's $26.6 million damage award for Mackenzie was unreasonable.

Mackenzie was fired in 1993, less than a week after Best told management that his discussion of the NBC comedy "crossed the line." In the episode he discussed, Jerry Seinfeld's character temporarily forgets his girlfriend's name, remembering only that it rhymes with a female body part.

He sued, saying the firing for merely discussing the episode was unfair. The company said the discussion was only the last straw in a series of problems it had had with Mackenzie, including unrelated allegations of sexual harassment in 1989 that led to an out-of-court settlement.

Miller attorney John Casey called it a big victory to have the punitive damages against Best dropped but that Miller will continue its appeal.

Casey said the judge ruled that under law, the jury could not assess punitive damages — to punish Best — because it had not found her liable for any part of the actual damages — Mackenzie's true dollar loss for his firing.

Police search buses for 2 brothers charged with 5 murders, robberies

ASSOCIATED PRESS

MANGUM, N.C. — Authorities Tuesday found the car belonging to two brothers sought in the slayings of five migrant workers and believe the men took a bus out of Charlotte.

"If they haven't, they've done a pretty good job of fooling us," Maj. Sam Jarrell of the Richmond County Sheriff's Department said. Two buses were searched and authorities planned to search others.

Jose Luis Cruz Osorio, 28, and Alonso Cruz Osorio, 18, have been charged with five counts of murder and five counts of robbery for the shootings Sunday night in this tobacco and cotton-farming area 50 miles east of Charlotte. A sixth man was wounded and survived. The victims were housemates of the two men.

A taxi driver who saw a news report about the slayings contacted police late Monday, saying he had taken two men to the bus station in Charlotte earlier in the day and saw them go up to the ticket window.

Officers then tracked down the Isuzu car driven from the scene of the shooting, finding it parked outside a Charlotte convenience store just after 1 a.m. Tuesday, Jarrell said. It was being searched for blood and other evidence.

Greyhound buses traveling to Atlanta and Montgomery, Ala., were intercepted Monday, but the brothers were not found. More intercepts were planned Tuesday, especially in western states, Jarrell said. The men are believed to have moved here last spring from Austin, Texas.

Kitty Hamilton, who lives across the road from the home where the slayings happened, said the bloodied survivor, Jorge Benitez, came banging on her door, and her family was frightened at first.

"We didn't realize he was as scared as he was," Hamilton said. "It was more of a scream of terror. I thought he was going to bust the door down. It was out in the country and there were no lights."

The Hamiltons called 911 but stayed out of sight, peering through windows.

Across the street, dozens of shells were scattered on the blood-smeared hardwood floors of the red brick house. Investigators identified the weapons as a Chinese-made SKS assault rifle and a .22-caliber weapon.

"It appeared that after they had shot everybody, they went around and shot each one of them in the head and robbed them and left," Sheriff Dale Furr said.

Each of the eight men had been paid $200 Friday, a neighbor said. They had spent the day harvesting pumpkins nearby before returning to their sparsely furnished home.

Another neighbor, Kim Chandler, said the men were polite and respectful. One man she knew only as Jose used her telephone to call his mother and family in Mexico City, where he sent much of his pay.

"All of those guys were working together yesterday just fine," Chandler said.

Benitez was in fair condition after surgery at Carolinas Medical Center in Charlotte.

The dead men were identified as Jose Benitez, Laurentino Diaz Bivar, Magbaleno Diaz Bivar, Jose Sanchez and Jorge Valasco, the Charlotte Observer reported. The Mexican consulate in Charlotte was helping locate the victims' families in Mexico.

"Five people were dead and you have moved out in the country to get away from it," Hamilton said. "I think I want to move to the city where it's safe."

LOOKINGback

1956 - Legendary broadcaster Mel Allen was at the mic this day, describing Don Larson's perfect game as the New York Yankee pitched the only perfect game in World Series history. Larson threw 97 pitches, faced 27 batters, struck out 11 and lead the Bronx Bombers to a 2-0 shutout of the Brooklyn's Dodgers in Game 5 of the Fall Classic. In the words of the immortal sports play-by-play great: "How about that!"

The Land of the Rising Sun

Jacobs' 2nd travelogue offers look at Kobe, Japanese bathing rituals, confusing address system

First Stop, Kobe Japan

Source: The World Wide Web

ANDREW MARCINIAK/Collegian

Ghostly blue mountain
Rising out of the sea mist
First glimpse of Japan

I wrote this haiku on the afternoon of Sept. 26, when we first sighted land after two long weeks of crossing the Pacific Ocean through bad weather and rough seas. A mountain had just appeared on the horizon, the Japanese island of Miyake Shima, and it seemed appropriate that the Land of the Rising Sun should reveal itself in such a mysterious and dramatic way.

We knew so little of Japan then. Little did we know how well we would know it in just a few short days.

The sense of excitement and relief aboard the ship was almost palatable. We knew we were less than 24 hours away from our first port of call, Kobe. We were so close, nobody could fully concentrate during classes the entire day.

KEVYN JACOBS stands by the ship on which he is spending a semester at sea.

We arrived at Kobe at 11 a.m. the next day. The first thing we noticed about this port city is that it's literally squeezed between the mountains and the sea. It is a tiny amount of habitable land between deep water and steep slopes where every meter of available space is widely used.

The Japanese are masters at using space. They have to be. Japan is roughly the size of California, but only 20 percent of it is habitable land. The other 80 percent is mountainous. In that 20 percent, they have to cram in a population half the size of the United States.

At the Port of Kobe, we were greeted by a fire boat spraying fountains of water in the air and a full brass band playing Disney tunes. (The Japanese seem to be Disney-crazy.) We cleared customs and excitedly disembarked to experience this exotic land.

Exotic? Hah! If it weren't for all the Asian faces and the fact that everything was written in Japanese kanji, you could mistake Kobe for any city in North America. Japan has been so thoroughly Westernized by the process of globalization that there seems to be a McDonald's on every street corner in every city, large and small. Wendy's, KFC and Coca-Cola are also omnipresent.

Many signs are written in English as well as kanji, and the Japanese are required to study English in high school, so the English-speaking traveler usually doesn't have much trouble navigating in Japan. And if you go into a Japanese department or convenience store, some of the brand names might be unfamiliar, but most of the products are not. (It's all expensive, though. The Japanese economy is the second strongest in the world, after the U.S., and the yen is very strong to the dollar. Japan is not a good place to bargain shop).

The dress of the average person is also Western. I think I saw a total of five kimonos and those were worn almost exclusively by older people.

Fashion among the younger, urban Japanese is typical of what you'd find in any U.S. city: name-brand tennis shoes, jeans, multicolored hair, baseball caps and T-shirts or sweatshirts with logos from U.S. products, sports teams, rock stars or universities. In a department store in Kobe, I even saw a University of Kansas sweatshirt on display for 2,500 yen, or about $25.

While in Kobe, I sought out an Internet cafe to communicate with folks back home and to catch up with the ECollegian. Afterward, I caught the bullet train for Tokyo. The Japanese have a wonderful transportation system of which I am incredibly envious.

If you need to go somewhere, there's probably a subway, train or bus going there. The bullet train, or Shinkansen, travels the 400 kilometers from Kobe to Tokyo (a little longer than the distance between Kansas City, Mo., and St. Louis) in 3-1/2 hours.

Like most everything in Japan, it's expensive — 14,000 yen, or about $140, for the one-way ticket to Tokyo. At speeds of up to 180 kph (about 112 mph), it's definitely the best way to travel between the largest Japanese cities.

Tokyo is nuts. That's the best way I can describe this bustling capital. New York City on its most frantic day cannot compare with the fast-paced energy of Tokyo. Millions of people rushing around at all hours of the day and night and it seems that every single one of them has a cell phone. From business executives in their three-piece suits to housewives out shopping to schoolgirls in their uniforms, they all seem to have cell phones stuck to their ears. The Japanese have a reputation for being gadget-crazy, and there seems to be some truth in that.

I came to Tokyo not just to play tourist but also to do some research on my field project for one of my on-ship classes. I am writing a comparative report on the lives of gay and bisexual men around the world. Most students on Semester at Sea are required to do some degree of field research in the countries we visit on a topic of interest to them. Before I left Kansas, I made contact with a number of potential interview subjects around the world via the Internet. I was in Tokyo to meet some of these individuals.

But while trying to find my destination in Tokyo, a gay bar in the Shinjuku district, I came face-to-face with that bane of most foreigners visiting Japanese cities — the Japanese address system. In short, I got very, very lost.

In Japan, they don't identify addresses by street and number, the way we do in the West. Japanese addresses are in the format of the city borough name followed by a set of three numbers that indicate district number, block number and then the building number on that block.

For instance, I was looking for a place called the Popular Bar, with the address of "Shinjuku, 2-12-16," which means it is in the Shinjuku borough of Tokyo, in the 2nd district, on the 12th block, in building No. 16 on that block. Ack!

The problem is, there seems to be no rhyme or reason to the numbering system. None of it seems to follow any logical pattern, and almost nothing is marked.

Figuring out which district you are in, much less what block you are on or what particular number the building is, can be a logistical nightmare. Even when I stopped to ask directions, the person didn't know where it was. I think the locals are confused by the system as well. Fortunately, perseverance paid off, and I found my destination.

After two days in Tokyo, I returned to Kobe to do a little sightseeing. I visited a Buddhist temple, Suma Dera, which was built more than 1,000 years ago. Later, I traveled to the top of Mount Rokko, the highest peak in the Kobe area.

Mount Rokko provides a splendid view of Kobe; its sister city, Osaka; and the Bay of Osaka from its 931-meter summit. The view is breathtaking, and it felt so good to get into placid forests with green all around me after the time spent in the asphalt and concrete canyons of Kobe and Tokyo.

Perhaps the best experience of my stay in Japan came in Tokyo, when I visited a public bath. Many Japanese apartments, including the one belonging to my Japanese friend, Junzo, do not have bathtubs or showers. People living in these places go to the public baths to clean themselves, and Junzo took me on this visit.

The experience of bathing communally (yes, I was naked in a room full of naked Japanese men) was the quintessential Japanese experience for me during my stay. They shower first to remove all the dirt and grime, then enter the tubs, which were just short of being a scalding 42 degrees Celsius.

Once you get used to the water, it's wonderful. Then you leave the tubs and squat on little stools while scrubbing yourself. I left the public bath feeling cleaner than I had in a long time and very reinvigorated. I highly recommend the experience for anyone traveling in Japan.

Finally, on the night of Oct. 1, we departed from Japan, sailing out into the Pacific Ocean and turning south toward the East China Sea. It was a bittersweet parting. Sweet, because in just less than two days, we'll be arriving in Shanghai, China. Bitter, because nobody wanted to leave behind the new friends we had made and the experiences we had had in the Land of the Rising Sun.

Attack on nation's computer network still possible

ASSOCIATED PRESS

BALTIMORE — Neither government nor industry has the means to protect the nation against computer attacks that could shut down communications and power grids, the chairman of a presidential commission studying the problem said Tuesday.

"While a catastrophic cyber attack has not occurred, we have enough isolated incidents to know that the potential for disaster is real and the time to act is now," said Robert T. Marsh, chairman of the Commission on Critical Infrastructure Protection.

In a speech to the National Information Systems Security Conference, Marsh said several government and academic sites that prided themselves on tight security were targets of a recent e-mail attack.

"A flood of e-mail messages originating in Australia and Estonia — and routed through the White House computer system — virtually shut down Langley air base's e-mail for hours," he said.

In another case, someone in England routing messages through Latvia, Colombia and Chile and commercial Internet service providers gained access to computers at Rome Laboratory at Griffis Air Force Base in Rome, N.Y., and "launched attacks against a wide array of defense and government computer systems," Marsh said.

In an interview before his speech, the retired Air Force general said "the tools are available, the knowledge is available to do serious harm."

Marsh's commission is scheduled to give its report to President Clinton next week.

He said it would recommend far greater cooperation and sharing of information between government and private industry, accelerated research and a nationwide program to educate people on the scope of the problem.

In the interview, Marsh conceded that there will be a need to break down reluctance within industry and government to share sensitive information.

He said there is a need to "devise the means by which the private sector can in fact be willing to share its information and not fear that it will leak."

At the same time, the government "is going to have to recognize that in this new era, it's the private sector that needs some of this threat information and this warning information."

Marsh said the threat comes from a broad spectrum of what he called "bad actors," including recreational hackers, organized criminals and terrorists.

"We have found no smoking keyboard," he said, "no evidence of anybody wanting to try a debilitating attack on our critical infrastructure."

But, he said, the tools to do serious harm to the nation's infrastructure "are readily available. They can be effectively utilized by people with only rudimentary skills and basic understanding of computers."

He said there is evidence of "unauthorized penetrations into all manner of automated information technology systems every day of the week."

Marsh told the conference that the cyber threat represents a "cultural change" that requires a concentrated educational effort at all levels from graduate programs to grammar school.

The commission will recommend that the White House sponsor conferences "to spur new curricula in computer ethics and intellectual property for elementary and secondary schools."

The commission also is calling for a doubling of federal funding to $500 million for research into ways to combat cyber threats.

houses and drove many longtime legislators to run for other offices or return to private life.

Twenty-six current legislators, including Assembly Speaker Cruz Bustamante and Senate President Pro Tem Bill Lockyer, both Democrats, will reach the end of their term limits next year. Others have already been ousted, including Brown, who was forced out in 1995 after three decades in the Legislature.

Joseph Remcho, a lawyer for two former legislators and one current legislator who challenged the initiative, said the ruling "sends a powerful message to those who are writing initiatives that they have to be straight with the voters."

A federal judge struck down the term limits earlier this year, saying the lifetime ban violated the rights of voters and candidates.

But the effect of the ruling was held up pending the appeal. The filing deadline for the 1998 elections is next February.

Of the 21 states with term limit laws, seven, including California, have lifetime bans on future candidacies. Reinhardt said it was possible that such a ban would be justified by the state's right to control its own form of government — an issue the court did not decide — but in any event voters must be told what they are deciding.

Reinhardt was joined by Judge Betty Fletcher. In dissent, Judge Joseph Sneed said voters were adequately notified of the lifetime ban by opponents' arguments in the ballot pamphlet. He also said the measure was constitutional.

"The states, consistent with their unique ability to serve as a laboratory in which certain political theories and practices are tested, should be permitted to experiment with term limits," Sneed said.

DOCTORS

The disadvantage of selecting a specific doctor is the waiting period.

Claire Bloom, senior in psychology, said she was told she couldn't see her doctor until the next day.

"I had the flu. I didn't want to feel miserable all day, so I took the doctor soonest available. I guess that's the price to pay," Bloom said.

"I could have waited for my doctor, but waiting another day would have been miserable."

Lehning said waiting to see a specific doctor is the only drawback.

"The bottom line is that doctors can be chosen for a price," he said. "The price is how much you want to work around your schedule."

SPEECH

Renner was made fun of by his peers, but when he finally came out of the closet it was the people who mattered most, his parents, who stuck by him.

"I told them I was gay and they stood beside me the whole time, even right in front of the priest," he said.

Renner explained racism and oppression on all levels, from the institutional racism that he said large corporations such as Nike exhibit in foreign countries, to having people honestly answer the personal question, "Do you trust people different from yourself?"

Finding answers to the problems of homophobia and racism is the work of generations to come, and Renner said that progress will only be made if people follow the wisdom of Ghandi: "The only way real peace is going to come to our world is by knowing each other."

depend on the purpose and the funding level, Eileen Reichert, development officer at KSU Foundation, said. Teaching awards reward excellence in teaching while the other awards and endowed chairs generally are for exceptional performance, she said.

The selection of awards is done by the engineering dean in consultation with the department heads, Reichert said.

Many of the awards come from business sponsors and alumni of the college.

"One of the ways they are put in contact with the college is through a faculty award," she said.

An award is expendable money that is given to the college while endowments for professorships and chairs are funded through the endowment's income, not the endowment.

The money awarded ranges from $1,500 to $12,500 and is added to the salaries of the faculty for the year.

Chuck Burton, professor of architectural engineering, also received an award.

"Be dedicated both in and out of the classroom," he said. "Be available. You can't teach everything in a one-hour setting."

Top soldier to stand trial on sexual misconduct charges

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON D.C. — Sgt. Maj. of the Army Gene McKinney, the service's top enlisted soldier, was ordered Wednesday to face a general court-martial on sexual-misconduct charges involving accusations by six women.

No trial date was set. The Army asked that McKinney be arraigned as soon as possible on 20 counts of misconduct.

McKinney has maintained he is innocent. He remains suspended from his duties as sergeant major of the Army and is assigned to nearby Fort Myer, Va., where he has been working on his legal defense.

The case, which started with sexual misconduct accusations by a former aide, retired Sgt. Maj. Brenda Hoster, has been a source of enormous embarrassment for the Army, which has contended this year with a string of sexual harassment and abuse cases.

After the initial allegations became public, McKinney asked the Army to allow him to retire.

McKinney

Charles Gittins, McKinney's civilian defense attorney, said in a telephone interview broadcast by MSNBC that he and McKinney were disappointed in the court-martial decision, but that it was no surprise.

"I think it would be very difficult for a convening authority not to send a case to trial after having spent more than $100,000 investigating it, and having six women make allegations against the sergeant major of the Army, regardless of whether or not the convening authority believed the allegations," Gittins said.

McKinney will plead innocent at his arraignment, Gittins said. "There's never been any doubt about that. He's not guilty."

Gittins had said earlier that if a court-martial were ordered he would file a motion detailing cases in which Army general officers accused of the same activity alleged against McKinney were not threatened with prosecution. He said the officers were allowed to retire with full benefits.

Earlier this week, Gittins filed a motion denouncing the Army's initial report from his preliminary hearing as "flimsy and superficial." McKinney, who is black, has accused the Army of racial bias.

The decision to take McKinney to trial in a general court-martial was made by Maj. Gen. Robert F. Foley, commanding general of the Army Military District of Washington. Foley announced the trial would be at Fort Belvoir, Va.

Foley also disclosed that two of 22 counts that had been referred to a preliminary hearing this summer were dropped. Eric Clark, spokesman for the Military District of Washington, said the two counts were dismissed by Col. Owen Powell, a reviewing officer who submitted his recommendations to Foley last week.

The two counts that were dismissed were among three charges brought by Hoster, who had been McKinney's public affairs advisc and is now retired from the Army, Clark said. The dropped charges were one count of maltreatment of a subordinate and one count of assault by battery.

If convicted on all counts, McKinney would face a maximum of 56 years in prison, loss of all pay and allowances, dishonorable discharge and reduction to the lowest enlisted rank, Clark said.

The first of six women to accuse McKinney, Hoster testified that during a 1996 trip to Hawaii, he came to her hotel room, lifted her up and kissed her.

Hoster's attorney, Susan Barnes, said Wednesday her client was "perfectly well satisfied" that the case was moving toward trial. Barnes said she was concerned, however, that Army Secretary Togo West might intercede and grant McKinney's request for retirement before he is arraigned.

After Hoster told her story in public, the other accusers came forward.

Sgt. Christine Roy was the one to allege that McKinney had sex with her. She said she reluctantly gave in on Oct. 30, 1996, when she was eight months pregnant.

Among the 20 counts for which McKinney is to be tried are one count of adultery, three counts of soliciting a female sailor and one count of soliciting a female soldier; one count of assault on a commissioned officer; and two counts of wrongfully impeding the criminal investigation of his actions.

The alleged misconduct occurred between 1994 and 1997.

As recently as last Wednesday, McKinney publicly asserted his innocence. During an interview on CBS's "Public Eye With Bryant Gumbel," McKinney said he would not accept any deal with the military if it forced him to make any admissions.

"I am not pleading guilty to anything," he said. "I continue to tell you that I am innocent of all these allegations and charges."

Gittins refused to discuss any defense strategy, but did say it will be aggressive and thorough. "You can be sure and the Army can be sure that if it's legal, if it's ethical, if it will benefit the sergeant major of the Army we are going to do that," he told MSNBC.

Callers jam phone lines during storm

TRAVIS D. LENKNER
staff writer

Riley County Police Department dispatchers had their hands full during a Wednesday afternoon tornado warning.

But it wasn't because of the weather.

Riley County Emergency Management Director Patrick Collins said citizens jammed 911 and business phone lines when tornado sirens sounded in Manhattan at 5:20 p.m. Wednesday.

> All of the lines were lit up for a good 15 to 20 minutes. They were running us wild down here. That really takes away from stuff that we need to do and notifications that we need to make.
> • Patrick Collins
> Riley County emergency management director

They were calling to ask why the sirens were going off, which kept dispatchers from other duties during the emergency situation, he said.

"All of the lines were lit up for a good 15 to 20 minutes," Collins said.

"They were running us wild down here. That really takes away from stuff that we need to do and notifications that we need to make."

Others weren't even calling about the sirens, but they were still ignoring the city-wide warning to take shelter.

"We had one person call who wanted to report a traffic accident that happened last week. I told him to call back later," Collins said.

If the sirens sound, there's no time to ask questions, he said.

OVERLAND PARK, Kan. — Starting in the spring, Kansas will get a chance to see how its students measure against those in other states on certain standardized tests.

On Tuesday, the Kansas Board of Education voted to have some students take National Assessment of Education Process tests. The board also directed Department of Education staff to begin purchasing national results on three other standardized tests already taken by some Kansas students, to see how they fare.

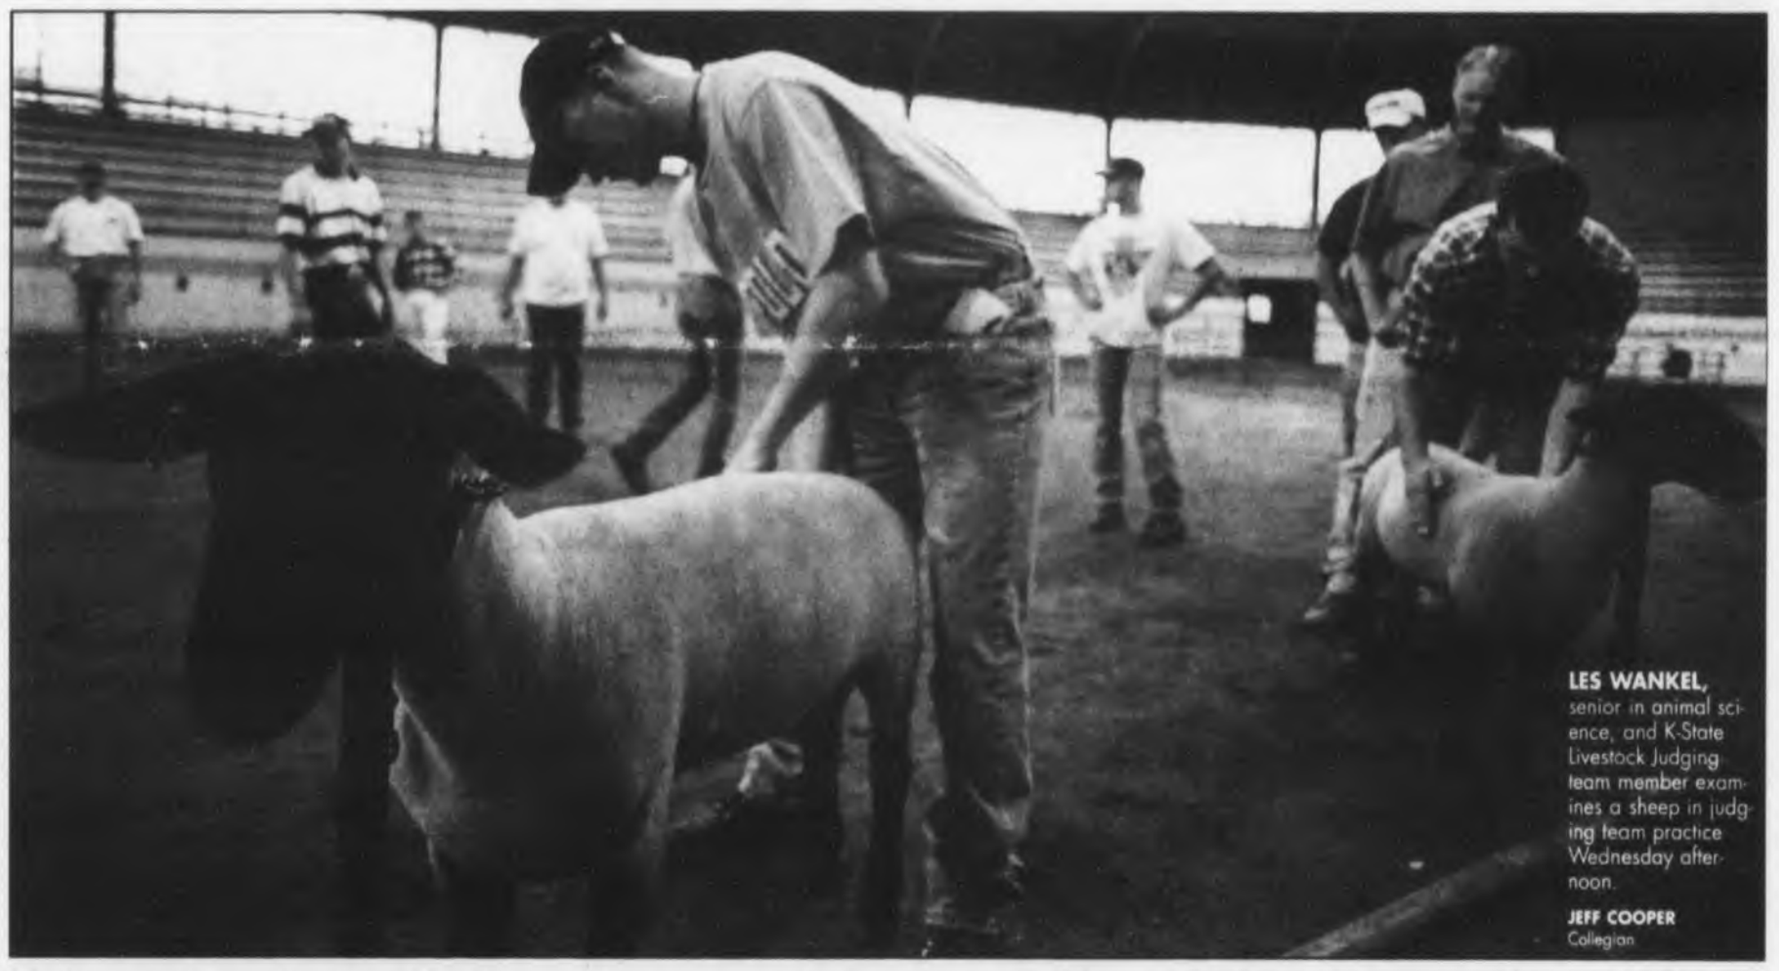
"I think it's a positive step," board chairman Kevin Gilmore of Olathe said. "What's been missing from the assessment issue is national comparison, other than the ACT or SAT. This gives us an independent measure of lower grades."

The ACT and SAT are college entrance exams.

The national assessment tests have been administered since 1980, but Kansas had passed them up to concentrate on its own assessment program, Gilmore said.



In the spring, fourth- and eighth-grade students from more than 100 Kansas school districts will take national assessment tests in reading. The students, 25 per grade level from each district, will be selected at random.

Districts' participation in the program will be voluntary.

The state also will spend about $25,000 on national results from the Iowa Test of Basic Skills, the Comprehensive Test of Basic Skills and the Stanford Achievement Test.

Those three tests are offered to students in first through 12th grades.

Livestock judging team on quest for 4th championship

KERRY BOYDSTON
staff reporter

The K-State Livestock Judging team is going for the gold — again.

Next month, the team will participate in its most important contest of the year, the American International Livestock Exposition in Louisville, Ky. If the team wins the contest, it will be declared the National Livestock Judging Champion for the fourth consecutive year.

"This is an important contest because the team that wins is crowned the national champion," Coach Scott Schaake said. "If we win, this will be the fourth year in a row, and that's big.

"It doesn't matter how many contests we win throughout the year. If we don't win in Louisville, we aren't the national champions anymore," he said.

Schaake said K-State has been very fortunate to have had great judgers on previous teams.

"For the past three years, we have been the champions. Those members worked hard to achieve their goal, and I am not anticipating changing anything about the way we will prepare for this year," he said.

Livestock judgers practice three days a week and take weekend trips to farms in the area to see a variety of animals.

"Sometimes we take an extra day or two before a contest and work out," Schaake said. "We have the American Royal judging contest before we head to Louisville, and I'm not anticipating changing our strategy much from now until then."

Like all judging contests, Louisville will consist of 12 classes made up of either cattle, hogs or sheep. The judgers will analyze the animals and rank each class on its quality characteristics.

Members must then prepare an oral defense for eight of the 12 classes and present the reasons to contest officials. The scores from the rankings and reasons are then tabulated for a final score.

"Back in January at the National Western Stock Show in Denver, our team tied a record set in 1969 for the most points scored at the show," Schaake said. "That just proves we can do it."

Schaake said this year's team is the most competitive and spirited group of individuals he has coached.

"The competition within the team is so strong. I can honestly say these 10 young men are dedicated to judging and winning. Only five of them will be able to judge in Louisville, and I don't know which five they will be," he said.

Some team members are beginning to feel the pressure being placed on them to win the national championship again.

"I think everyone on our team feels a bit of pressure because we are trying to do something that has never been done before," Dustin Dean, senior in animal science, said. "We just have to go out and judge like any normal contest."

Bill Disberger, senior in animal science, said when the K-State livestock judging team arrives at a contest people notice.

"The other schools don't cut us any slack," he said. "They always look over our shoulder to watch how we are doing things. We have run into a few teams that think they can beat us, but we take the attitude that we are going to beat them instead, and so far not many have beat us."

Disberger said he believes the team is in a very good position going into Louisville.

"I know we can do it. There is a lot of pressure because we have won three times, but I think it would be cool if we win a fourth and set a new precedent for everyone to follow."

Schaake said he agrees, but still believes in a little luck.

"Each year the level of competition increases drastically. In order to win, we are going to have to have an incredible day," he said. "And I still believe in lady luck. You need a little luck once in a while."

Panelists address question of hate speech on campus as part of Coming Out Week

ANDREW MARCHEAR/Collegian

NATE JENKINS
staff writer

What is hate speech? How can it be avoided? Who is at fault?

Many questions were asked Wednesday night in Union 212, and few of them had specific answers.

John Fliter, faculty adviser for the American Civil Liberties Union at K-State, and Scott Ladd, editor in chief of the Collegian, spoke about hate speech on campus and how their respective organizations have handled it.

Fliter said the ACLU, a strong supporter of First Amendment rights, has an established position of not favoring campus hate speech codes.

Instead, Fliter said the ACLU focuses on eradicating prejudice at the roots and recommends universities attract more minorities, require classes on racism and have student orientations where different people can interact on a regular basis.

"Censorship drives bigoted expression underground," Fliter said. "A university should be a free market of ideas and hate speech should be followed by more speech."

Fliter said about 60 percent of the colleges and universities in the United States have codes banning hate speech on campus, and K-State is one of them.

Ladd spoke about difficulties the media, specifically the Collegian, have encountered maintaining free speech without crossing the line of decency and using hateful speech.

"Those of us who are involved with the mass media, we have the power to say a lot to a lot of people without getting too much feedback," Ladd said. "We have to be responsible for everything we say. The media should not condone racist speech."

After Ladd and Fliter gave their presentations, members of the small audience were asked to respond, and had an open dialogue about the dangers of hate speech for more than an hour.

Some participants brought up problems of hateful speech at K-State.

Others focused on what should be done in the future to squelch racist and homophobic attitudes and promote more understanding between minority groups and the majority.

2 military school cadets remain in custody after throat slashing

HARLINGEN, Texas — A military school cadet had his throat slashed as he lay sleeping in bed, and two fellow cadets were arrested.

Gabriel Cortez had to have 28 stitches after the attack early Monday at Marine Military Academy. He told authorities he was awakened by someone on top of him and by pressure on his neck, officials said.

Initially, Cortez, 18, thought someone might have been playing a joke because horseplay is common among cadets at the school, which is for students in grades eight through 12.

But he soon realized it was a knife slashing at his throat, though he couldn't see who was attacking him in the darkness. A roommate in an upper bunk was unharmed.

Christopher Lee Boze, 17, of Olmito and Jeremiah George Jensen, 17, of Vancouver, Wash., were arrested Tuesday evening. Bond was set at $100,000 apiece at an arraignment Wednesday, and both remained in custody at the Harlingen City Jail, officials said.

Teen mom hides newborn in closet while attending school each day

CENTRAL ISLIP, N.Y. — A teen-ager gave birth in secret and hid her newborn son in her bedroom for 2 1/2 weeks while she continued going to high school, leaving the boy alone during the day, police said. The child was doing well at a hospital.

The teen's mother, Stephanie Clark, found the 4-pound infant in her daughter's bedroom closet Tuesday and called police. Shanta Clark, 17, had not told anyone of her pregnancy or the Sept. 21 birth, Suffolk County Detective Sgt. John Twiname said.

She had been feeding him, but left him alone while she went to school from 7 a.m. to 3 p.m. every day, Twiname said.

The baby was born five weeks prematurely, but aside from being somewhat underweight was in stable condition and seemed to be doing well, said Dr. Margaret Parker, pediatrician at University Medical Center at Stony Brook.

Babies of the boy's age should be fed every two to three hours. Parker said doctors don't know how often the child had been fed, or what he was fed.

Premature infants have a weak cry, which could explain why no one heard the boy, she said.

Feds spend $333,000 on outhouse

DELAWARE WATER GAP, Pa. — Hikers who feel nature calling can find relief in a two-hole outhouse that cost the federal government more than $333,000.

The outhouse is without running water and isn't open in winter.

"It's a Taj Mahal," Rep. Joseph M. McDade, R-Pa., told The Philadelphia Inquirer in today's edition.

The bathrooms cost between $333,000 and $445,000 — based on different estimates from the contractor and National Park Service officials. The agency spent about $102,000 on planning and design, $81,000 for an on-site engineer and $150,000 to $262,000 for construction.

More than a dozen park service designers worked on the bathrooms, which opened in May 1996 in Delaware Water Gap National Recreation Area, 90 miles north of Philadelphia.

The baseboards in each restroom are painted with $78-a-gallon custom-mixed epoxy resin that matches the surrounding hemlock evergreen woods. Wildflowers planted around the foundation are certified Joe Pye Weed Seed — costing about $720 a pound.

The toilets are $13,000 state-of-the-art composting models that eliminate water-quality problems.

KU Medical Center clerks plead innocent to embezzlement charges

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — Two former University of Kansas Medical Center employees have been charged in Wyandotte County District Court with felony theft in the alleged embezzlement of nearly $50,000.

An internal audit and simultaneous criminal investigation led to the arrests of Berta D. Nicholson, 40, Kansas City, Kan., and Pamela G. McMickle, 36, Kansas City, Mo.

The women, who have almost 20 years of medical center experience between them, worked as clerks in the Medical Center outpatient pharmacy.

Nicholson and McMickle pleaded guilty and were released on $5,000 bond and will have a preliminary hearing Tuesday. The two could face between five and 17 months in jail plus fines.

The investigation traced months of financial misappropriations at the pharmacy beginning Oct. 1, 1996, and ending July 1 of this year. The funds were linked to everyday transactions.

Kansas artists showcase 2-dimensional art-work at 20th Series Postcard Art Show touring exhibit

KRISTIN BOYD
staff reporter

Everything from acrylic to computer-generated art-work is on display at the Twentieth Series Postcard Art Show at the Manhattan Town Center.

The postcard art show, a project sponsored by the Association of Community Arts Agencies of Kansas, features different Kansas artists.

The postcard-sized, two-dimensional works will be on display until Oct. 17.

Ellen Morgan, ACAAK executive director, said about 200 artists entered this year's contest.

Morgan said the artists had to be residents of Kansas, but their works did not have to be based on a Kansas theme.

Stephen Doherty, a New York art editor who publishes American Artist and Watercolor, was chosen to judge this year's competition.

Twenty-six pieces were selected by Doherty to be on the touring exhibit. Only 16 of these 26 pieces were chosen to be made into sets of postcards.

The 16 winners each received $150 and a set of 250 of their own postcards. The remaining 10 winners each received a cash reward of $50.

"The exhibit is currently on display in Manhattan because of the local artists being featured and their sponsors," Janice Lee, adviser of the ACAAK board, said.

Jim Hagan, former art instructor at K-State, is one of the artists on display with his watercolor, "April Burn-Off." Another local artist, Raeford W. Lewis, is being featured with his acrylic, "High Sky-Buffalo Spirits Over Kansas River." Rick Hildebrand, an artist from Green, Kan., is on display for his mixed media titled, "Pride."

"We just had exceptional works of art this year. There are some in this year's display that I particularly like," Lee said.

The ACAAK-sponsored art-work will be on tour for most of next year.

The postcards are for sale at the Manhattan Town Center or at Varney's Book store.

Family Weekend allows parents to experience campus life

JULIE LINDAMOOD
staff reporter

One weekend a year, K-State honors the family members who support their K-State children, Teto Henderson, program adviser for the Union Program Council, said.

"The purpose of Family Weekend is to give people a chance to come to campus, to visit their students while they're here and get a feel for the student life on campus," Henderson said.

Family Weekend begins Friday with a pig roast and runs through Sunday, Henderson said. There are many activities Saturday including campus tours, comedy shows in Forum Hall, pictures with Willie the Wildcat and individual programs in departments on campus.

"K-State students will be able to show their families what it's like to go to school at K-State," said Sara Reser, junior in marketing and publicity chair for Chimes Junior Honorary.

The honorary K-State family will be named during halftime of the football game, Reser said. Chimes members helped select the honorary family and will be having a banquet to honor them on Saturday morning.

The main idea of Family Weekend is for students to be able to see their families and have structured activities, Reser said.

"My parents are big K-State fans, and they like to go to the game and see what I do while I'm here at school," Danielle Gowing, senior in elementary education, said.

Besides being a great time to see her family, Gowing said the weekend gives her an opportunity to show her parents what K-State's student life is like.

"My parents like having so many things to do when they come to visit me," Gowing said. "Since it's my last year here, they really appreciate having this weekend to spend time together."

Student chapter provides opportunity for benefits, insight into graphic design

LORI GUILFOYLE
staff reporter

With the purpose of providing students an insight to the professional field of graphic design, a student chapter of the American Institute of Graphic Artists was initiated this fall on the K-State campus.

The K-State AIGA chapter is the first student chapter in Kansas to be affiliated with the national professional organization. There are two professional chapters in Kansas, in Wichita and Kansas City. AIGA's mission is to further the advancement of ethical guidelines and educational advance of graphic designers.

"Our goal is to get students really involved," White, senior in advertising and co-president, said.

AIGA exposes students to available options in the graphic-design field by providing many benefits to its members, White said. From the educational aspect, being involved allows students to receive one-on-one attention from professionals working in the field. They also gain exposure to differing views of their own peers.

Bob Hower, area- head of graphic design, computer imaging and photography, is the adviser. Hower said after working in the industry, he saw the importance of this organization to students. By bringing this chapter to K-State, he said it would enhance students' experience.

"It is part of a national organization that promotes the development of graphic design," Hower said. "I think that is really key."

Additionally, members are provided with opportunities for portfolio reviews, information regarding internship options and special meetings with professionals in the graphic-design field. The organization tries to bring in anything that pertains to the field, Erica White said.

"It gives students the opportunity to rub shoulders with professionals," she said.

There are many opportunities for students to get involved. AIGA is sponsoring a logo contest open to anyone that is a graphic-design major, said Nicole White, senior in graphic design and the other co-president. There are plans to have a World Wide Web site, newsletter and T-shirt design contest as well.

AIGA has an elected education board made up of students, graduate students and faculty. This committee decides what can be done to make graphic design a better program. The students come up with the ideas, and the faculty and adviser help them do it.

"Basically, I'm a cheerleader," Hower said. "I try to motivate them and establish a foundation."

The first meeting on Sept. 11 included a speaker who is an art director from an advertising agency in the Kansas City area. Other speakers AIGA anticipates bringing to students include animation artists, free-lance artists and art directors from other agencies. Nicole White said AIGA provides an insight for students on the possibilities that are options after graduation.

"A lot of students just go through the motions. AIGA gives them more focus," she said. "It gives a lot more knowledge and know-how of the graphic-design field."

Students who wish to belong to AIGA are required to pay a $45 national due each year. Graduating members are allowed to pay the student fee for one year after graduation. After that first year, membership dues increase to a $140 entry-level fee, which is applicable for four years. Then the fee increases to the professional fee of $225.

There are 60 members involved in AIGA. Anyone interested in graphic design is welcome to attend the meetings and become a member, Erica White said. Meetings are on the third Thursday of every month.

"I am impressed with everyone in the club, the enthusiasm taken and the involvement that has been put forth," Erica White said.

"The officers are very qualified," Hower said. "These students are geared for excellence."

House sends approved abortion-ban bill to Clinton

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Inviting another veto from President Clinton, Congress sent the White House a bill Wednesday that would make it a crime for doctors to perform certain late-term abortions.

Clinton vetoed a similar bill last year. "The president's position has not changed," a spokesman for him said Wednesday.

The House passed the bill on a 296-132 vote, more than the two-thirds majority needed to override the anticipated vote. The Senate has passed the bill twice, but on neither occasion was there a two-thirds veto-proof majority among its 100 members.

Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott, R-Miss., said Wednesday he believed there was a "real opportunity" this year to overturn the veto.

But Rep. Charles Canady, R-Fla., the chief sponsor, sounded less optimistic. "We face a battle in the Senate," he said after the vote.

House members repeated emotional but familiar arguments during two hours of debate. In the end, 217 Republicans joined 79 Democrats to approve the Senate-passed bill. Voting against it were 123 Democrats, eight Republicans and one independent. Six members did not vote.

Supporters of the ban said the procedure is "heinous," comparable to infanticide, and that there is no medically justifiable reason to use it.

Democrats countered that the Republican majority was hunting for a campaign issue and was playing politics with women's health. Others said the focus on one procedure wouldn't do anything to reduce abortions nationwide.

"Why are we voting on this piece of legislation again and again and again?" asked Rep. Diana DeGette, D-Colo. "The reason is clear. In the 1998 elections, the Republicans think they can saddle people with this."

Rep. Henry Hyde, R-Ill., noted the ban wouldn't outlaw abortion.

"But we're stopping a loathsome, grizzly byproduct of the mindset that treats people as things and as objects," he said. "We're saying halt this cruelty now, not tomorrow."

The House passed the ban last

Qualified admissions seen as positive step toward college success

The Kansas Board of Regents recently passed a decision that all current high school freshmen will have to take an admissions test before being allowed to enter a regents school.

On the surface, this might sound elitist. But it will actually help the education level of Kansas students. It will allow students who are serious about their education to begin at the college level immediately following high school.

Those students who are not as serious about college, or perhaps would like some time before committing to a school and degree, can use this as a chance to re-evaluate their goals and take some time off before continuing their educations.

No one ever said college had to follow high school immediately. And for some people, it's better if it doesn't.

The universities of this country are crowded with students who simply don't know what else to do with themselves. Higher education has become something you just do after high school. By taking some time off before college, they can mature and access their goals before ever walking onto campus.

This could cut down on the number of times students change majors and will save them and their families time and money.

Qualified admissions will also raise the education level of all new admissions. Time spent getting students up to speed in classes like College Algebra and Expository Writing I can be spent pursuing classes in their majors.

Qualified admissions can only help the state education system. Students at the high school level will be forced to focus themselves before taking the test and once in college they will know why they are there.

If students who are not serious about why they are here continue to come to school, eventually the meaning of the degree is lost for everyone.

After all, a diploma is only as good as the reputation attached to it.

MISSING FROM THE ABORTION DEBATE

A few steps beyond the threshold of the K-State Student Union, my feet were scuffing up someone's newly drawn chalk masterpiece. These low-level billboards are usually for something I'm not that interested in, such as a sorority rush or a bake sale, so I walk on.

Usually.

On this day, however, it's a pro-life message: the word abortion with an international "no" ring around it. Around its perimeter, someone has written, "Make women slaves."

VIEWPOINT

TERRY WELCH

TERRY WELCH is a junior in radio-television. You can send e-mail to Terry at tlw1915@ksu.edu

All I could feel was anger — at both authors. Abortion is an issue that can't be discussed by chalk underfoot. It's an issue in which everyone is more wrong than right.

First, the liberal "pro-choicers." We liberals look at the world sometimes through decidedly tinted glasses. In the instance of opposing welfare cuts and the like, this isn't so bad. Worst-case scenario: We err on the side of human beings rather than money. Maybe our government helps some truly lazy people along with those who really need the help. So be it.

In the case of abortion, though, we hang obscurant phrases like "reproductive rights" on truly straightforward issues. It might be hard to believe that I'm not judging anyone when I write this, but life is life and death is death. When you allow an abortion to happen, you are sanctioning the death of a child. At least have the courage to call it what it is. The argument that says a fetus is not a human life until a certain point in its development is nothing but a legal mechanism and a salve for conscience.

Stand in a maternity ward and peer into this baby aquarium for a while. Watch the babies testing their new existence, their off-kilter clockwork motions and then try to honestly say that six months before they had no connection to human life.

Another thing we liberals do is call abortion a "right" as if it is ingrained in the fabric of the universe. Once again, we are fooling ourselves. Abortions happen, babies die because our culture has given them the power to do so, right or wrong.

Finally, I am often struck by a significant contradiction inherent in my region of the political spectrum. We believe criminals should have a chance at redemption, at proving themselves again with a clean slate. Yet we fight to allow those who are truly tabula rasa, who have had no chance at life, to be killed. All potential for that person is lost.

As for the pro-life camp, especially those who claim to come from a Christian perspective, remember this: It is one thing for you to voice your opinion, but it is another for you to judge. You have not been given that right. The Bible itself has expressly removed the burden of judgment from you.

Secondly, I think if I were a Christian "pro-life" protester, I might be more concerned about the way I was going to be judged. The methods pro-life protesters use to get their point across often seem to be as much of an abomination as the most horrible abortion. For example, the use of images depicting aborted fetuses is ghoulish and should be offensive to any sane person.

Imagine your son or brother had been killed by a drunk driver, his body horribly mangled in the accident. How would you feel if a picture of his body were splattered on billboards and World Wide Web pages to prevent drunk driving? It might be a good cause, but that hardly justifies the brutality of using that image to disgust people into joining your side (which I don't think it really does).

Yet the supposedly Christian-based Operation Rescue national home page practically gushes about the collection of grotesqueries you can download there: "These are the graphics that the pro-death community really hate to see."

All this having been said, I can't offer my own truly concrete opinion about the topic, because I can't seem to form one. I do believe that abortion is truly awful, but it could be because I have two beautiful children of my own, or because I've known some amazing people born into situations that placed them at risk of never having been born at all.

But I've also stood behind a good friend who made the decision to have an abortion. I couldn't possibly judge her for making her choice. It wasn't easy for her.

It's not a decision that I will ever have to make. It might be cowardice, but for that I'm thankful.

EDUCATION should be emphasized more than SPORTS

The concerns of college coaches, like their players, come and go in cycles. The troubling cycle should make coaches concerned that the nature of their industry's raw material—players— is changing.

High school players are coming to college with tattoos, earrings and professional attitudes. To a greater extent than before, coaches complain, the new recruits seem to have lost a feel for the classroom. Education beyond the court is a distant universe.

The importance of education in our college athletic programs must be restored.

It's time for high school coaches to play a more prominent role asthey used to and make it possible for this game to get better and better.

Placing the responsibility on high school coaches is tempting. In the grander scheme, the college coaches and their colleagues hold the key to changing the fundamental relationship between the sports program and the university.

The gap has widened so much that big-time spectacles like the Final Four have increasingly less to do with higher learning and more to do with higher earnings.

If coaches want to make a statement, they'll take the lead. They'll go back to the classroom. Coaches like to refer to themselves as "teachers" and the gymnasium as their classroom.

Sorry, that doesn't wash.

The difference between players and "civilian" students is that players are hand-picked, luxury items. They come from across the nation for one reason — to play. With rules diminishing the contact coaches have with potential players, the player-coach-school relationship has become estranged.

Friends, boosters, AAU coaches — even agents in some cases — are telling players they are good enough for the NBA, often before they're really ready. There needs to be a model for athletes, a standard of how high school players get advice. Education must be stressed, and it has to start early.

People aren't talking to these players earlier about the values of education. Communication between player and coach must be seen. When you don't have accountable people talking to young athletes, you don't have them being told the right thing.

That is precisely why coaches need to go on the educational offensive and become a more active part of the university's teaching life. They need to re-establish the lost link between the two sides of a campus.

It would be a good idea for coaches to coach and teach classes at the same time.

The basketball and football programs have become such a staple of the university complex that, in most college communities, the coach is accepted as an odd but lucrative square wheel. The idea of the classroom becomes something distant and remote. The big-time college football and basketball coach leads a busy life.

A life too full for teaching.

So the coach says he's a "teacher," but he doesn't teach, and the university hierarchy lets it go. It's easier to play that charade than change a faulty foundation that gives false validity to the myth of a coach as an educator.

Coaches could fit comfortably in that role, for example, from April to June. Have the coach and assistants teach a six-week course on some facet of the sports industry.

Offer tenure.

What education has become for athletes is far less important than what it has become for coaches and presidents at schools with large athletic departments. The coaches' association bemoans the loss of an educational instinct, but the flame is not being rekindled by coaches whose primary focus is coaching, as if the rest of the university doesn't exist.

But if the coach won't embrace the classroom, why should the player?

The U.S. Department of Education study of public school seniors says those with extracurricular activities — sports has the largest participation — are three times as likely to have a GPA of 3.0 or better.

In high schools, studies are given priority, and other activities come later.

If players need time to study, coaches should excuse them from practice.

Grades should come first. That must be the priority.

I can imagine coaches ordering their players, after two hours of morning and afternoon workouts, to be at practice for three hours before their physics exam in the evening. Even thoroughbreds need rest after a long run. But these academic-thirsty souls won't get the chance. It usually works out like this: practice-shower-exam.

How can these students who come to college to study do well on their exams with this type of rigorous schedule? Its not the Army. Again, athletes have to maintain grades to compete with their classmates.

Education is what makes players real people after school. After all, that's what they should get after four or more years of college.

Even if they want to, they can't be bookworms. At the maximum, they can spend an hour or two a night on studies.

Parents are key factor before all this. Parents should stress education before sports.

They should add expectations. This is what will make them succeed.

A minimum GPA cap of 2.5 suggests that sports does beyond a reasonable doubt hurt the education of athletes at colleges. Education is the key to earning a decent living after college.

GAMMA plans activities for alcohol awareness

Editor,

The K-State chapter of Greeks Advocating the Mature Management of Alcohol will be sponsoring the National Collegiate Alcohol Awareness Week activities Oct. 20-24. The week is designed to increase student awareness regarding alcohol issues and to promote the responsible use of alcohol for those who drink.

Oct. 20 and 21, GAMMA will have a table at the Health and Fitness Fair. On Oct. 22, 46 luminaries will be on display at each participating sorority and fraternity to represent the 46 college-aged people who died in Kansas in 1996 because of drinking and driving accidents.

An additional remembrance will take place at the K-State vs. Texas A&M football game Oct. 18. Coach Bill Snyder will deliver a message regarding drinking and driving, following 46 seconds of silence as the K-State Marching Band plays "Taps."

We encourage all students, faculty and staff to participate in the week of activities and for those who drink to continue responsible use of alcohol throughout the year.

Coming Out Week asks for persecution of lifestyle

Editor,

This is in response to Mary Renee Smith's column, "Welcome to My Family," which ran Monday.

Let me start by saying I have no problem with people of different sexual orientations. I'm actually related to a wide variety of them. They have their ways, and I have mine.

But being gay or straight or whatever doesn't really seem like a cause for a special holiday. I don't go around demanding everybody recognize me simply because I am straight. The way I see it, declaring a Coming Out Week to give some kind of recognition to those living a different lifestyle is asking for persecution.

The persecution is not for the lifestyle you lead, but for thinking everybody wants to know. How about respect for your fellow people, no matter what their choices are? This goes both ways. What kind of insightful turnaround in attitude do you expect from an exhibition?

Sure, you bring the most outrageous, out-of-touch person from any "family," and people will flock to get a look. But you are also doing your "family" an injustice. Whatever happened to simply being known for who you are, not another label someone has put on your head? I am sure there are plenty of people who could fall into your "queer" stereotype who do not appreciate being labeled this way.

The comment, and maybe suggestion, was made that we should all take a minute to "talk to a queer." Like this is some kind of rare event that nobody would want to miss?

I talk to plenty of people on a daily basis, some straight, some gay, bisexual, etc. I enjoy these conversations not because I have something to run home and tell the roommates about, but because they are friends. Just people like everybody else.

I realize that this is not a view everybody shares, but maybe by promoting it instead of separating yourselves from all other people, you'll have a better chance of people really getting to know you.

Mural behind in Hale move

MATT KREPS
staff writer

Tucked away in one of the most secluded spots of Hale Library is a lesser-known mural.

The mural, in the former multicultural library site, celebrates K-State's diversity and the struggles of minority groups in America.

"We Are the Dream!" began in 1978 and took two years to complete. The mural is the work of former student artists Travis Mosely, Willie McDonald and Harold Carter.

The site, now a staff area, is open from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. as a study space. In the evenings, the mural can be seen through the large windows installed to keep it visible at all times, said Molly Royse, social sciences bibliographer.

The former multicultural library was a gathering place for minority students between classes, said Frances Vitali, intern in the Minority Resources Research Center.

"It is a place where a lot of our minority alumni spent time studying and meeting," Royse said.

The mural began as a suggestion to add character to the multicultural library. Mosely was chosen as the original artist in 1978. McDonald, a friend of Mosely, also wanted to be involved with the painting.

The artists' original design was rejected by black, Hispanic and other multicultural groups on campus for various reasons. Some groups objected to the content while others objected to the portrayal of specific figures. After reworking the design several times and collecting input from student groups, the mural's final design was reached.

The painting was slow work. Preparing the surface took several coats of paint because the walls were too porous to paint on directly. Mosely graduated in 1979 while work was still in progress. Carter and Teresa Guillen added to the artists' pool of talent and the work continued to completion.

When the library was renovated, the multicultural library moved from the fourth floor to new facilities on the third floor. Leaving the mural behind was a difficult choice, Royse said, but the center needed more space.

Moving did have one disadvantage — the multicultural library was not as visible.

"Some people walk by this center and don't realize they've been here," Royse said.

In an effort to add to the center's identity and keep in touch with its past, plans are under way to create a large print of the mural to hang in the new location. The staff is also working on getting more artwork related to multicultural studies to enhance the center's visibility.

"We're trying to keep the rich history of the center alive while we make some changes to move forward," Royse said.

The space on the fourth floor is not forgotten. Royse said tours of the multicultural library begin in the old room with the mural. The room is also used for meetings and student discussion groups.

"We started having sessions that meet there in that space. It does provide a nice meeting space on occasion, and we want to pursue that," Royse said.

State to see increase in revenues

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Kansas lawmakers next year will be faced with how to deal with a wealth of state revenues, which one legislator said will be $200 million more during the current budget year than first thought.

"Our good economic times have grown to better times," said Rep. Henry Helgerson Jr., D-Wichita, Wednesday. "We are growing great guns."

The state is flush with money because of a robust economy, with unemployment at 3.6 percent and a windfall corporate tax payment of $66.6 million from Western Resources.

The windfall followed news that state revenues were $64.6 million above the estimate for the first quarter of this fiscal year, and an 8 percent-plus increase in property appraisals this year means school property tax will generate $20 million more revenue than expected.

Helgerson, the ranking Democrat on the House Appropriations Committee, told reporters that the budget year ending June 30, 1998, is expected to see tax collections of $3.9 billion rather than $3.7 billion as projected last April.

And, he said, the excess revenue should continue in the $200 million range in fiscal years 2000 and 2001. He said the projections were based on data assembled by the Legislative Research Department.

The lawmaker said the Legislature, which convenes in January, will have the option of cutting taxes, adding money to state programs or a combination. Helgerson said he had some ideas about what to do, but declined to discuss specifics.

He said the current state budget, totaling nearly $8 billion, won't be reworked because of the extra money, but it will be used in shaping the future state spending plan during the 1998 legislative session.

"I don't know where the Democrats and Republicans will come down on this. There are 165 of us who will be making the decisions," Helgerson said.

Gov. Bill Graves agrees state revenues are on the upswing, but will have his Division of Budget do its own projections on exactly how much extra money the state might expect, his spokesman Mike Matson said.

"There's no secret we're in pretty good shape heading into the 1998 session," Matson said.

He noted the Legislature and Graves will do their budget planning based on a new consensus revenue estimate that will be set in early November. Matson said the governor will propose a fourth year of tax relief, but said the specifics won't be revealed until Graves' State of the State address in January.

Matson said the governor is weighing whether to push for increased funding for various state programs. Already, Graves is calling for spending more money to improve the state parks' roads, campgrounds, beaches and buildings.

Other lawmakers also have their ideas on what to do with the extra money. For instance, Rep. Phill Kline, R-Shawnee, who chairs the House Taxation Committee, said additional state revenue could mean eliminating the statewide property tax for schools.

ABORTION

March, but had to vote again to approve changes made by the Senate before Clinton could be presented with a bill. The vote was the fifth by the House on the issue in just more than two years.

Republicans revived the bill this year after learning the procedure they call partial-birth abortion was more common and used earlier in pregnancy than previously believed. It would not permit such an abortion, even when the pregnancy jeopardizes a woman's health.

The House passed the bill, 295-136, in March with enough votes for an override. The Senate amended and passed the bill, 64-36, in May but fell three votes short of the total needed for an override. Clinton and abortion rights groups have insisted on a provision allowing the procedure when a woman's health is endangered. Republicans say that would render the ban meaningless.

The bill bans the procedure — which involves the partial delivery of a fetus, legs first, through the birth canal followed by the drainage of its skull — except when needed to save a woman's life. Advocates on both sides of the issue were expecting a veto.

"Once again, American women are looking to President Clinton to safeguard our health by vetoing this dangerous bill," said Kathryn Engustian of the American Civil Liberties Union in Washington, D.C.

The National Right to Life Committee said it anticipated a veto because Clinton "is a political captive of the abortion-on-demand crowd."

White House spokesman Barry Toiv said Congress would include a health exception if it were "serious about passing legislation."

Pro-choice groups also were disappointed by the vote. But they noted that bans in nine states have been blocked by the courts because they were ruled unconstitutional or likely to be declared illegal.

"We urge President Clinton to veto the bill and remember that real women suffer when Congress is allowed to play politics with their lives," said Gloria Feldt, president of the Planned Parenthood Federation of America.

Missouri vs. K-State game will be battle of quarterbacks

SAM FELSENFELD
staff writer

Forget about Missouri vs. K-State.

On Saturday, when the Tigers come to town, it's Corby Jones vs. Michael Bishop.

It's one of the best running quarterbacks in Missouri locking up against one of the best running quarterbacks in Kansas.

Jones leads Missouri in all three rushing categories with 91 carries for 429 yards — an average of 5.3 yards per carry. Bishop is the Wildcats' third-leading ball carrier, having picked up 131 yards through K-State's first four games.

"Both of them are extremely fine athletes," K-State coach Bill Snyder said. "Their style of play is a little bit similar."

> Both of them are extremely fine athletes. Their style of play is a little bit similar.
> • Bill Snyder
> K-State football coach

Jones will lead Missouri's option offense against K-State, the third option opponent in four games for the Cats.

When he doesn't hold the ball, running backs Devin West and Brock Olivo will probably get their hands on the ball. Along with Jones, they account for more than 80 percent of the Tigers' carries.

And Jones doesn't like to pass. Through Missouri's first five games, he's averaged fewer than nine completions, and given Missouri coach Larry Smith's view of K-State's secondary, he might not get many opportunities to put the ball in the air.

"I think they have great speed. I don't think there's any question about that. I think they get better every week. They're not as experienced as when they had Gordon and Canty and all of those guys back there, but they do have great speed," Smith said. "They still have the talent back there, it's just a matter of them every week getting a little better."

With their speedy secondary and the lack of a large Tigers passing threat, the Cats expect to spend most of their time trying to stop the potent Missouri ground game. They also expect the Tigers to mix up their rushing attack.

"Against Ohio State, which I consider to be a very fine defensive football team, (Jones) ran the ball well. He got some big plays, I thought, on the option, keeping the ball," Snyder said. "And you can't overlook the fact that they also have a very fine running back.

"There's nobody I have any greater respect for than Brock Olivo. With what he's done in the past, you can't assume the ball's gonna stay in Corby Jones' hands all the time in the running game. I'm sure it won't."

Missouri (3-2 overall, 1-1 in Big 12 Conference play) will try to win its first game with K-State (3-1, 0-1) in five years. The Tigers will also try to avoid losing their fourth-consecutive game in Manhattan. Missouri is expected by many to lose, but Smith is confident the Tigers can remain competitive.

"Last year we beat Clemson, and they're a very good football team. That was a breakthrough," he said. "I think our players have confidence that we can do that. I think we're gonna need to do it some this year."

Snyder is also confident that the Tigers can do some damage.

"I can't remember a better Missouri team since I've been here," he said.

SCOTT LEAVES TROUBLED PAST BEHIND TO PLAY FOR K-STATE

SAM FELSENFELD
staff writer

K-State free safety Cephus Scott played in his first Big 12 Conference game Saturday at Nebraska, hearing his number called when starting safety Lamar Chapman left the game with an injury.

On one play, Scott was watching Chapman take on one of the top offenses in the country.

And on the next, he was on the field, blocking out the distraction of the enthusiastic Cornhusker fans.

The sea of red in Memorial Stadium is often enough to overcome a visiting player's nerves. But for Scott, it was nothing.

There was nothing worse than the red he saw growing up in Galveston, Texas.

> ... it was just like going back home. They were all wearing red. The guys where I'm from, they want to be like gangsters and everything. Everybody in my town wears red.
> • Cephus Scott

"I was telling Dyshod (Carter, defensive back) on the bus it was just like going back home. They were all wearing red," Scott said. "The guys where I'm from, they want to be like gangsters and everything. Everybody in my town wears red."

The red some Galveston natives wear isn't to support the Huskers or the Texas Tech Red Raiders. It's to show they belong to the Bloods, a notorious street gang.

"They want to be hard gangsters back home," Scott said. "That's why I kind of want to be up here. They want to be Bloods, so everybody wears red. I was telling Dyshod on the way up here, 'I'm not gonna be scared. I'm gonna be right at home with all this red.'"

His performance showed that he felt like he was at home and he didn't have any problems stepping up against the Huskers. He intercepted a pass from Nebraska quarterback Scott Frost, the first interception by K-State's secondary this season.

"It makes me so proud," said Graddy Scott, his mother. She's always been influential in his life and was able to catch the game on television. "He's always been a good kid. I knew he would make it, because he's always had a plan."

Scott was born in the projects in Galveston and didn't move out until he left for college. When high school rolled around, he had a choice to make.

Bloods or football?

His friends chose the Bloods. But for Scott, the decision was easy.

He kept his aggressions on the football field, watching his friends get into trouble as he started earning all-America honors his sophomore year. He knew better — he watched his family endure street violence while he grew up.

"My older brothers were involved," he said. "But I didn't ever want to be in the situation they were in. Right now, I'm 21 years old and I haven't seen my brothers in 16 years because they're in prison."

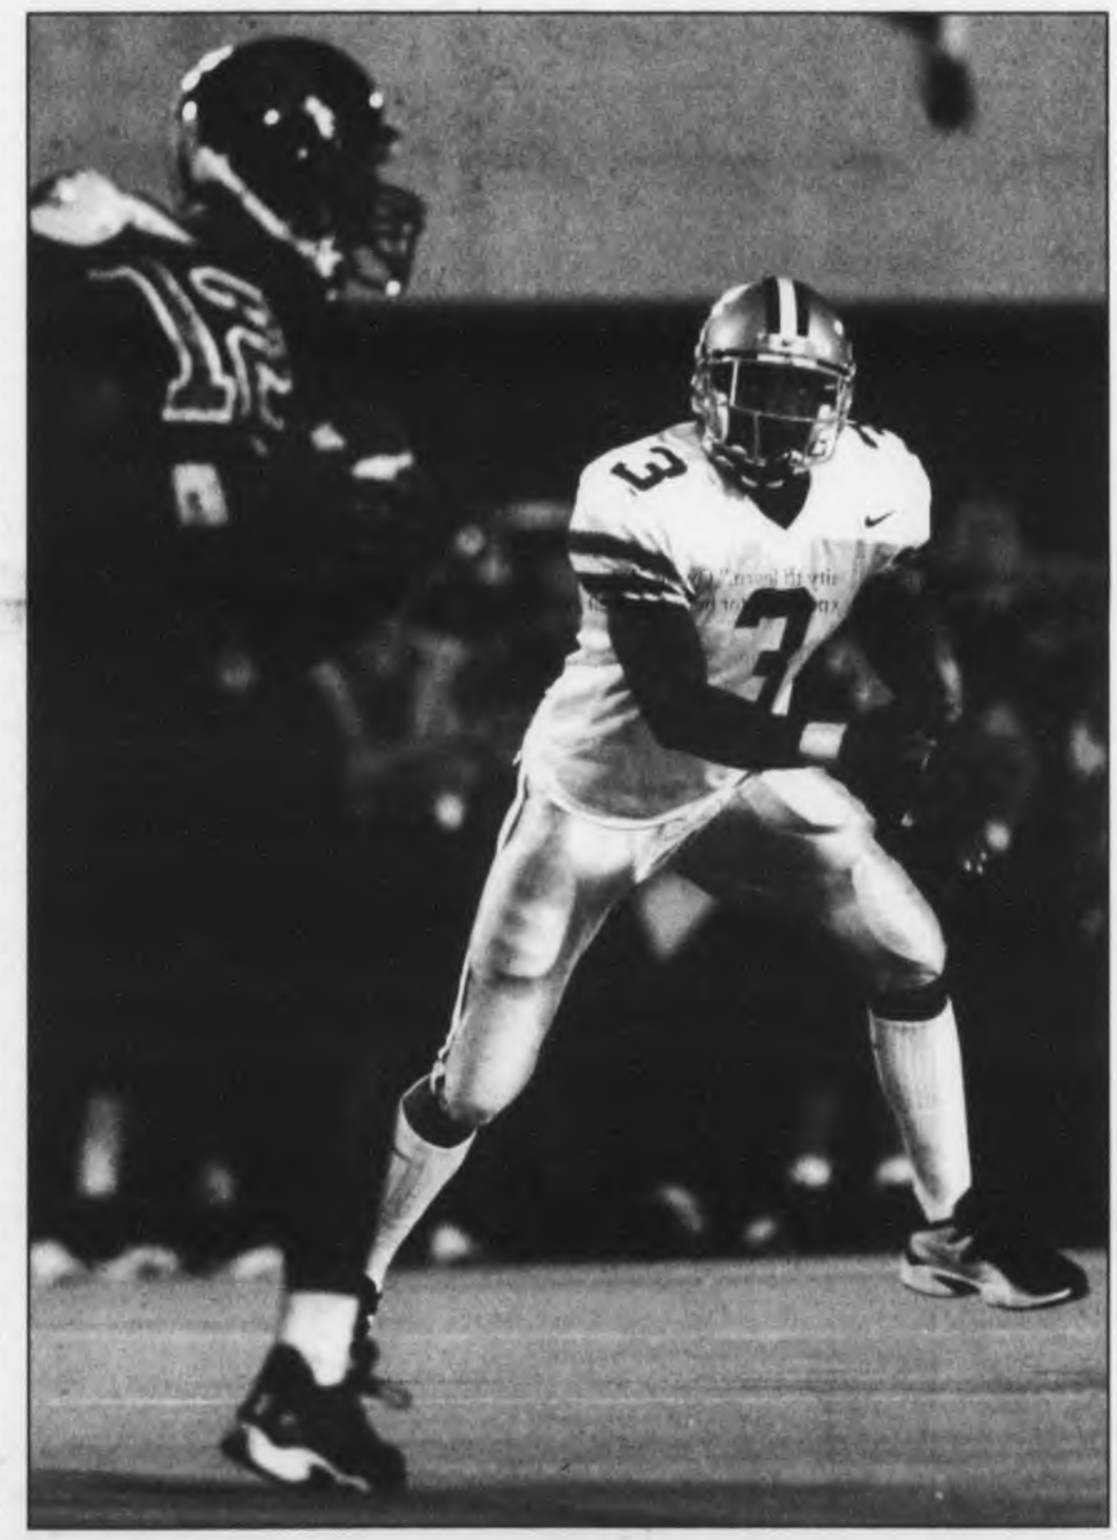
Although he hasn't seen his brothers recently, he could get in touch with them in the near future. Earlier this week, he received a letter from one of his brothers, who is in a Texas prison.

"It's not really from my brother," Scott said. "It's from one of the inmates. The inmate was talking about how my brother has been trying to get in touch with me. It says, 'I'm a friend, and your brother is hurt over the loss of contact with you.' He tells me my brother is hurting right now. I don't ever want to be in that situation."

Reading the letter humbled Scott. Now that he's in Manhattan, he's free of the temptations and dangers. But he's happy to have grown up in Galveston unscathed. He still wants to maintain contact with his family and plans to write his brother back.

Although he was happy to get the letter, certain aspects of it angered him, specifically the ink. The letter was intentionally written with a red pen — the Bloods' color. He figured his brother would learn a lesson after spending so much time in prison.

Scott's other brother might learn a lesson, but it is almost too late. He recently woke up from a six-month coma, caused by injuries sustained in a Colorado prison riot.



Scott works hard on the football field and in the classroom to avoid coming across the same problems his brothers have faced. He also wears a bracelet as a constant reminder of the troubles he's been fortunate enough to avoid.

It's a simple, red rope bracelet given to him by one of his brothers. It is not gang-affiliated, it was merely a gift. Still, every time he looks at it. He knows he's made the right choices. And he looks at it often. In fact, he never takes it off.

While he looks forward to a reunion with his brothers, Scott knows he'll never see at least one member of his immediate family again. His father died when he was 7 years old.

"I watched him get killed. That's motivation to not get involved in all that stuff," Scott said. "He took me to visit a couple of his friends. Him and

Women's golf team struggles through Big 12 Fall Preview

JOEL WHITE
staff writer

In what Coach Kristi Knight called an "awful performance," the women's golf team took 11th place in the Big 12 Fall Preview at Columbia, Mo.

"We got off to a great start this year, and we had high expectations for this tournament," she said. "But we made a lot of mistakes, and we also had some bad luck."

After the first 32 holes, the Wildcats were in last place, seven strokes behind 11th-place Colorado. In the third round, Colorado shot a combined score of 345, the worst score turned in by any team. The Wildcats clinched 11th place with a score of 333 in the third round.

Oklahoma State, the tournament champion, finished 69 strokes ahead of K-State.

Knight said the entire team struggled for the first time in the season.

"We couldn't put 18 holes together," she said. "Every player had a good nine holes on the first day. Unfortunately, golf is an 18-hole game."

The Wildcat's top finisher, junior Jane Yi, tied for 30th place after shooting an 83-80-79 on the par-72 course.

After the second round, Yi was sitting in a tie for 41st place, but her score of 79 in the third round propelled her to 30th place.

Knight said Yi's short game struggled the most.

"She hit the ball a lot better than she scored," Knight said.

Sophomore Carrie Chambers was one stroke behind Yi, shooting an 81-79-83 to finish in a tie for 33rd place.

Junior Mitzi Taylor finished in 53rd place, and senior Ann Slater finished in a tie for 54th place.

The team's bad luck occurred before the tournament started when its top player, freshman Edie Murdoch, was struck with the flu.

After playing 12 holes in the first round, the illness forced Murdoch out of the two rounds on Monday.

Knight said Murdoch started the first round hoping that the illness would go away, but she withdrew from the competition after 12 holes for safety reasons.

"She spent the afternoon in the Missouri training room with their football players," Knight said. "They swore she was a spy."

Murdoch returned to the competition in the third round, where she shot an 84.

Knight said the loss of Murdoch might have affected the team's final standings, but it didn't affect the individual players.

"The fact is the four players that were playing didn't play as good as they should have," she said. "Losing a player shouldn't be the end of the world."

Thoughts of football occupy columnist's mind

Studies have shown that the average adult male daydreams nearly 200 times a day, with a large portion of those dreams involving women.

Although I consider myself to be an average male, I will neither confirm nor deny whether the average part is accurate.

I am pretty certain, however, that during this time of year, the majority of the average male's thoughts tip in favor of football. At least, that's what I find myself thinking about in the middle of a boring lecture.

To prove my theory, I decided to jot down a few of my thoughts after this weekend's gridiron action.

1. Nebraska has now sold out 217 consecutive games at Memorial Stadium in Lincoln. I guess I should be impressed by that, but really, where else are they going to go? If the Cats could string together 30 years of decent football, and we erased the Jayhawks and Chiefs from existence, we could have the same kind of streak in Manhattan.

2. Is it just me or have all the NFL teams been wallowing somewhere between mediocre and pathetic this year? The three teams that have combined to win the past five Super Bowls — the Cowboys, 49ers and Packers — have been far from impressive, and the rest of the teams don't look any better. To give you an idea of what it has come to, the Buccaneers were a touchdown away from being 6-0.

3. On the way home from the Nebraska vs. K-State game this weekend, I listened to a Huskers talk show. Several fans called in and complained about how easy Ahman Green was getting tackled during the game. The host of the show said he looked like an NFL-bound player trying to avoid an injury before he picks up the big check. I believe he referred to it as Calvin Jones Syndrome. Am I missing something here? Isn't Green the same guy who ran for 193 yards and four touchdowns against the Cats? I get the feeling the fans that called in to this show were the same ones who booed Scott Frost a few weeks before.

4. Let's see. Miami's leading 17-14 with less than two minutes left in the game, and the Chiefs need 3 yards to keep their potential game-winning drive alive. I wonder if they'll throw a swing pass? Well, what do you know? There's the pass to Marcus Allen out in the flat and he's stuffed behind the line of scrimmage. I've heard of teams going to their bread-and-butter play, but usually a bread-and-butter play is one that actually works once in a while.

5. Despite the embarrassing loss to the Huskers this weekend, this might very well be the Cats' best shot at a 10-1 season to date.

Colorado, the Cats' nemesis for the past couple of years, has already lost twice and would have lost to Wyoming had it not been for some help from the man upstairs. Granted, there are six other teams besides the Buffaloes that stand between the Cats and a 10-win regular season, but they're definitely all beatable.

6. Denver has started the year 6-0 and Tampa Bay is 5-1. Both of these teams started wearing new uniforms at the beginning of the year, so it's apparent that new uniforms are the key to success in the NFL. Judging by these teams, it doesn't hurt for the uniforms to be incredibly ugly, either.

7. I guess it's time to welcome the Oklahoma State Cowboys, the new powerhouse of the southern division of the Big 12, into the mix after walloping Texas 42-16. I'm sure it will be a highly contested game if they face Nebraska for the Big 12 Championship later this fall. You know, I think I can actually hear the Huskers shaking in their shoes from here.

Well, I hope you enjoyed your little journey into the average male's mind during October. If you wish to find out more about typical male thoughts, consult a psychologist.

Associate professor receives China's Friendship Award for work during sabbatical

LORI GUILFOYLE
staff reporter

▶ Big winner. Gwen Owens-Wilson, associate professor of interior architecture, is accepting one of three Friendship Awards given by the People's Republic of China.

Gwen Owens-Wilson, associate professor in the department of interior architecture, has been invited to China by the State Administration of Foreign Experts of the People's Republic of China to accept one of three Friendship Awards presented this year.

Owens-Wilson, who spent last year on sabbatical in China, accepted the award in Beijing on Sept. 29 during a performance in her honor. The presentation was planned to coincide with the celebration of Chinese National Day on Oct. 1, when Chinese Premier Li Peng gave a reception.

"This is an incredible international recognition for Gwen and her work," Dennis Law, dean of the College of Architecture, Planning and Design, said.

Owens-Wilson taught at Chongqing Jianzhu University in the College of Architecture and Engineering during the 1996-97 school year.

She said the year was a learning experience as well as an eventful one. The teaching concept differed at Chongqing Jianzhu from what she was used to at K-State. In their studio classes, they had two or three faculty members with a class of 40 students. At K-State, there is one faculty member assigned to the same number of students.

The high point of her teaching experience came when 23 faculty members worked together to evaluate the students' work. Owens-Wilson said she was very impressed with the attitude the teachers took toward education and the importance they placed on the ability to learn from others' experience.

She was one of a team of faculty members who coached the winning team of students in an international contest on affordable housing. A second team from her adopted university took honorable mention in the competition, sponsored by the American Collegiate Schools of Architecture in Washington, D.C.

In addition to teaching, Owens-Wilson gave four speeches at the Southwestern Architecture and Engineering Institute in Xian, China. She worked on two books and was the English editor for a biography. She also did the writing and editing on a compilation of the entries for the international competition her students were involved in.

During her year in China, she also appeared on Chinese television seven times, which included a two-part television series on the architecture of Chongqing, a city of 30 million people where her university was located. She said Americans from the Midwest have an accent that is easier to understand.

Her TV appearances helped her to be known better in the academic community, she said. She was even chosen for a non-speaking part in a made-for-television movie, where she played a foreign correspondent.

She said she has a long love for China. This was her third trip, longest stay and the best experience yet.

Owens-Wilson said the people and the environment in which she worked were very supportive. She had previously visited China while doing graduate and independent study abroad.

"Studying abroad is one of the best things students can do for themselves. It gives them a view that there is more than one way to be educated. It's an opportunity to learn," Owens-Wilson said.

She said it was a learning experience for herself as well as for the students she taught.

"I learned more about how students learn," she said. "I learned to slow down my mode of delivery of information. I learned about different construction systems and different conceptualizations of the relationship of design and utility."

Returning home was a harder adjustment than she had anticipated, Owens-Wilson said.

"When I went away, I expected I didn't know anything, and I accepted that I had to be open to learn. A learning person absorbs culture, learns mores and the way to survive."

Man pardoned after DNA test proves innocence

ASSOCIATED PRESS

AUSTIN, Texas — Gov. George W. Bush agreed Wednesday to pardon a man who was cleared by DNA tests after serving 12 years in prison for rape.

Bush said he made the decision after a judge endorsed the genetic evidence exonerating 36-year-old Kevin James Byrd. The tests were conducted on his semen.

District Judge Doug Shaver determined Wednesday "that DNA evidence was properly handled and tested in the Byrd case, and secondly that based on this new evidence, Kevin Byrd is innocent of sexual assault," the governor said.

"I'm glad he did the right thing," Byrd said.

But Byrd also said doesn't understand why it took so long.

As a result of the new evidence, Byrd was released from prison on $1,000 bail July 30 while Bush decided whether to pardon him. Shaver, who presided at the 1985 trial, and prosecutors had both backed Byrd's request for a pardon.

"When you find someone innocent, why go through that process? Why hesitate?" said Byrd, who now works as a carpenter. "I just thank God that someone realized I'm innocent and did the right thing."

The governor had insisted that the court review the DNA tests to establish a procedure to be followed when such evidence is found.

"This case is the first of many that we expect to see during the next several years as DNA evidence is more widely used to review convictions," the governor said.

"It is absolutely essential to establish a proper procedure and precedent to handle these cases that ensures that both victims and defendants are granted due process, and that courts of law will review the validity of evidence before it is acted upon by a governor," Bush said.

Byrd was on probation for a burglary when a 25-year-old Houston woman told police he was the man who

Speaker warns consumers of threats

SHEYENE FOSTER
staff reporter

America's consumers still have many reasons to be discontented, Rhoda Karpatkin, president of the Consumers Union, said.

Karpatkin spoke Tuesday as the second speaker in this year's Lou Douglas Lecture series. Her speech was entitled "America's Discontented Consumers: A Global Dilemma."

Karpatkin listed three areas Americans should be concerned with as consumers.

These areas included threats to environmental and social stability, unethical and inhumane exploitation of workers, and the marketing of cigarettes.

In terms of environmental concerns, Karpatkin said both industry and consumers are part of the problem, and both must also be part of the solution. She emphasized that consumers are also partly to blame for environmental problems.

"A lot of the damage comes from the cars we drive and the way we consume," she said. "It comes from the way we live."

However, environmental degradation shouldn't be the only concern on consumers' minds, Karpatkin said.

Increasing concern is focused on a kind of social degradation caused by the rising importance of material objects in American's lives.

"There is a rampant commercialization in our lives that is rapidly overtaking other important values," she said. "It seems that material objects are replacing family, community and spiritual values in our quest for happiness and in our definition of happiness."

A rise in the number of sweatshops and other places of worker exploitation should also be high on the list of concerns held by the discontented consumer, Karpatkin said.

"There is no denying that the products we consume are sometimes made under abusive and exploitive working conditions," she said. "This is an issue which will not go away."

A final concern Karpatkin emphasized dealt with the marketing of cigarettes.

"For too long our society has tolerated tobacco companies' special efforts to mislead and endanger two target populations — young people, especially young girls, and consumers in developing countries," she said.

Karpatkin said all of these consumer issues were linked, not only as the source of discontent for American consumers, but also as the source of a global dilemma.

She said problems such as exploitation of workers, environmental concerns, increased materialism and the marketing of cigarettes are not limited to the borders of the United States. Thus the United States alone cannot solve them.

"These are all linked as global problems," Karpatkin said. "They will need the whole world and international cooperation to solve them."

Karpatkin listed a number of ways in which people can help to solve such global problems. She said that changes in lifestyle and ways of consumption of goods, exerting marketplace pressure and communicating with the government are all ways consumers can help.

Karpatkin emphasized it is the actions of individual consumers as a whole which will ensure improvements in the future.

"If America's discontented consumers can preserve their ideals and their backbone, then we can indeed be a part of a global solution," she said.

K-State draws top-ranked high school graduates

JULIE LINDAMOOD
staff reporter

For the last six years, K-State has attracted more first- and second-ranked high school graduates than any other college in the state, Pat Bosco, dean of student life, said.

"We're the number-one choice among number one's in the state of Kansas," he said.

K-State offers students ranked first in their class a guaranteed $1,200 in scholarships their freshman year, he said.

However, the money is not what brings top-ranked students to K-State.

"We have had great success in communicating the quality of the academic experience here and the activities outside the classroom that will compliment their academic status," Bosco said.

K-State is a comprehensive university where students can choose to participate in hundreds of campus organizations, classes and activities, Bosco said. This fall, 272 first- and second-ranked students began their freshman year at K-State, an increase from 1996's freshman class.

"When it comes to an undergraduate education, K-State is one of the best you can get," President Jon Wefald said.

PIETASTERS BREAK AWAY FROM ska TRADITIONAL SKA ROOTS

PHIL KELLUM
staff writer

Since forming in 1991, the Pietasters, from Washington, D.C., have created a reputation as one of the best ska bands in America.

The band's new album, "Willis," on Hellcat Records, furthers this reputation.

It has a lot of ska fans worried, simply because it's different from the band's past albums. Different is not a bad thing when it comes to this album. "Willis" is a fantastic record from beginning to end.

Sure, the cover art is bizarre, to say the least. From a baby shooting fire out of its diaper to pictures of ventriloquist dummy heads, it makes for interesting viewing while listening to the compact disc.

Former Bad Religion guitarist and head of Epitaph Records, Brett Gurewitz, produced the album and did a great job. It's the closest the members of the Pietasters have come to their live feel.

Review Music

The first track, "Crazy Monkey Woman," sounds nothing like the Pietasters. The band mixes '60s garage rock and soul to create one monster of a song. There is no ska at all on this song.

It features some downright nasty, distorted, fuzzed-out bass from bassist Todd "T-Bone" Eckhardt. His solo in the bridge of the song is just blistering.

Vocalist Steve Jackson manages to conquer the chaos with his gritty, raspy voice.

The next track returns the listener to the Pietasters sound of old with "Out All Night." It features some catchy sing-along choruses, much like the fan favorite "Maggie Mae."

Review Theater

It sounds like a television soap opera, but for Lew Shelton, director and associate professor of theater, it's just another day of rehearsal for the fall production of "A Lie of the Mind."

The play, written by Sam Shepard, was first produced in 1985. The cast consists of four men and four women, a moderately sized play for the fall. There is no time setting for the play, only a reference to World War II. Shelton guesses the play is set around the late 70s.

"The faculty discussed the fall season. We knew we'd be going against the musical," Shelton said. "Sam Shepard was suggested. Sometimes his plays are left up in the air, but 'A Lie of the Mind' has a kind of satisfying resolution. It's well-balanced and one of his best plays.

"We have one of the most strongly balanced casts we've had for some time," he said. "The cast has risen to the occasion of emotional content of the pieces."

Shelton said the story plot is about life and its many facets.

"Love is a disease, but Shepard comes to restoration," Shelton said. "It's about love without being sentimental, and about violence. There is an animal in us all, particularly men," he added.

"There are dynamic, interesting characters in the play," Shelton said. "You want to laugh, but at the same time you ask yourself, 'Am I supposed to laugh?'"

Shelton said there is a restoration of harmony and love that people get in comedy, leading this play to be called a tragic comedy. "A Lie of the Mind" almost appears to have a comical ending.

Orchestra premieres with fall program

LINDSEY FORTMEYER
staff writer

McCain Auditorium quickly filled its bottom mezzanine capacity. Very few seats were left empty for the Kansas State Orchestra's fall concert Tuesday, night.

A large amount of people from the Manhattan Community attended, as well as those students fulfilling their course credits and requirements for music classes.

Review Music

The audience was restless, while the orchestra members tuned their fine strings and horns. The lights went down, and conductor David Littrell started the evening's program.

The orchestra opened with "Symphony No. 9 in C Major ('The Great')," composed by Franz Schubert.

The instrumental works of the K-State Orchestra were that of Schubert's classical heritage. Rhythmical combinations of pitches, and recitations of what sounded like a magic spell, hypnotized listeners. There were smooth differentiations between resounding notes and those that were clearly amplified in an intense manner.

The horns and trumpets sounded with a lack of resonance, almost a timid sound. The sound needed a deep and full quality about its air, but after a few measures it blended with sustention.

The song carried a happy melody, although at times it was dark, dissident and intense. At one part of the piece, several different abrupt beats seemed to proclaim loudly.

"The Moldau," composed by Bedrich Smetana, changed the evening's mood. The flutes were harmonious in a soft, flawless sound. Together, in the middle of the piece, the whole orchestra paused in silence, as it was composed. Not a squeak or string could be heard.

The orchestra ended with "Academic Festival Overture," composed by Johannes Brahms. There were many small movements, yet it was flowed. The drums, combined with the rest of the orchestra, created a clean, swelling sound on some withheld notes.

The full sound was light, air, and bounding — definitely a great contrast to other intense movements throughout the entire piece. The orchestra finished, each section standing to be acknowledged, for what was an enjoyable evening.

Defense tests boundaries of death penalty

ASSOCIATED PRESS

DENVER — Tempers flared Wednesday as a federal judge blocked Terry Nichols' attorneys attempts to ask a retired postal worker death penalty questions similar to some that were allowed last week.

Defense attorney Ron Woods stalked back to his seat after U.S. District Judge Richard Matsch refused to let him ask the prospective juror if he thought the death penalty would be appropriate in cases such as premeditated mass murder.

Nichols

Matsch said, "I think this man has answered these questions as to what he would consider."

Woods then asked Matsch, "We're not to ask questions about the death penalty?"

Matsch told him he could not be specific about circumstances but could ask about the death penalty in general.

Later, Nichols' lead counsel, Michael Tigar, told Matsch they wanted to pursue the questions because the man "looked like he might be a life-for-a-life person."

Matsch said he stopped Woods because "I thought Mr. Woods was trying to direct an answer."

Nearly 45 prospective jurors had been questioned as the selection process moved through an eighth day.

Nichols, 42, most recently of Herington, Kan., could get the death penalty if convicted of murder and conspiracy in the 1995 Oklahoma City bombing that killed 168 people and injured hundreds of others. Timothy McVeigh was convicted of the same charges in June and sentenced to die.

Matsch excused one prospective juror, the daughter of Texas sharecroppers, after she began crying as she described a critically ill daughter. A devout Catholic, she said she could never impose the death penalty. Another candidate questioned was a package design engineer.

An obstetrics nurse at a Denver hospital who was questioned Wednesday is a co-worker of a prospective juror questioned last week. The two women realized they had been summoned for the trial when they were discussing the time they needed to be off work for jury duty.

Matsch this week has banned defense attorneys from asking certain death-penalty questions, such as whether a death sentence would be appropriate in a premeditated mass murder.

If the prospects say it would be appropriate, then they could be excused because they might fail to consider other factors, such as the defendant's family background and role.

Under federal law, jurors in murder cases must be willing to consider the death penalty as punishment. During Nichols' trial, the option of life in prison without possibility of parole is being emphasized, too.

Andrew Cohen, a Denver trial attorney monitoring the trial, said he believes Matsch has begun banning questions that "put these people on the spot."

More than 3,500 journalists have been credentialed since the trials of Nichols and McVeigh were moved to Denver in 1996, court officials said.

Lafene views prevention program as successful

LANCE SCHOEN
staff reporter

The effectiveness of Lafene Health Center's Top 10 Prevention Program was reported to the Student Health Advisory Committee meeting Wednesday.

Dr. Guy Smith said the program,helps nurses and doctors determine when students need to get checked for things such as blood pressure and cholesterol.

When students come in for checkups, their files are pulled. If the student is due, or overdue, for a certain shot or test, the file will indicate that and the proper action can be taken at that time.

Smith said patients will be made aware of the medical delinquency, and shots or test, do not need to be done by doctors.

"Most of the nursing staff can do it, so it doesn't take away from time spent with the doctor," Smith said. "So far it has been very successful."

Julie Tarara, SHAC chair, agreed the program is working.

"We want to help people with their preventative medicine," Tarara said.

A campaign to increase student health care membership was also discussed at the meeting.

Lannie Zweimiller, director of student health, said he has some things he wants to do to better assess why students aren't signing up for the program.

"We need some idea about what is going on with students on the health-care side of things," he said.

SHAC also introduced a new doctor on staff, Dr. Elaine Gonsior. She had a private practice in Omaha and will begin taking appointments Friday.

"We are very excited to have her because she is board-certified in so many different areas," Tarara said.

SCOTT

his friends got into an argument, he turned his back, and they stabbed his jugular vein. At that point, he pushed me and told me to run home. I ran home and the next day my mother told me he was dead."

Scott was very close to his father, and as a 7-year-old, he had problems dealing with the tragedy. But his mother was there for him, helping him cope with the loss.

"It was very traumatic for him. It was a major setback. He was doing real well in school that year and he ended up failing. It was a heartbreak for me, also, because they were so close," she said.

The male members of Scott's family have run into trouble, but the females have kept him going.

"I grew up with my sisters," he said. "I have four sisters. My mom says she thought I'd be feminine."

Feminine? Probably not. But he does credit his mother and sisters with keeping him focused on athletics.

Scott said he wants to end up in the National Football League soon. It looked like he was going in that direction before an injury during the first play of his senior season in high school sidelined him.

Entering the year, he was rated the No. 4 defensive back in the country. But on that first play, he suffered a pinched nerve in his neck, and was unable to move his left arm for about six months.

He couldn't play football, but he tried his right arm at basketball. He didn't want to play, but his mother forced him to. Scott stands 6 feet tall, relatively short for a basketball player, and he couldn't move his left arm.

But he still led his league in rebounding.

"I just wanted him to realize he has more than one way to go," Scott's mother said. "God gave him a lot of talent. He can play football, basketball, he can sing, and he's a very spiritual person."

Eventually, Scott regained the use of his left arm. He lost his scholarship to the University of Florida, but he got his football career back in order.

He played at Garden City Community College before suiting up for the Wildcats and is happy just to be on the field again.

If, for some reason, Scott doesn't make the NFL, he's banking on his degree. He'd like to go back to Galveston and be a social worker.

"His thing is to play football, and if he stays healthy and stays focused, I'm sure he can do that," his mother said. "He hopes to play professionally, but whatever he wants to do, I'll support him. I'm always behind him 100 percent."

Discolored, smelly water not dangerous

city editor

Many concerned Manhattan citizens called the Department of Utilities Wednesday when they found their tap water was discolored, smelled strange and had an odd taste.

No, it wasn't some sort of lethal contamination or a mix-up with the sewer lines. It was an overabundance of lime.

During Wednesday morning's routine basin-cleaning procedure at the Water Treatment Plant, an excess amount of lime was put back into the water stream and then spread throughout the city.

Lin McClung, administrative aide to the utilities department, said she answered many calls inquiring about the water.

"Most of the people were concerned about the color or odd taste of the water," she said. "We had to assure them that it's not at all hazardous and they should just wait it out."

McClung said lime is a common mineral found in the ground that simply affects the way water tastes, smells or looks.

She also said the problem had taken care of itself by early Wednesday evening.

McClung said the water flow in Manhattan is comparable to that of a river.

If something gets in the water upstream, or at the plant, you have to wait until it runs its course and more fresh water comes behind it.

McClung also added that if someone had been away from home all day and came back later that evening, their water might still have an odd taste, smell or be discolored.

"If they ran their water for 15 minutes or so the problem would be taken care of," McClung said.

WEATHER

"When people hear the sirens, they should take shelter immediately and then turn on a TV or radio. They should not call 911," Collins said.

The only time citizens should not be concerned about the sirens is if skies are clear during the normal test at 10:20 a.m. the first Monday of every month, he said.

Wednesday's storm was a fast-moving cell that developed west of Manhattan, Collins said.

The storm was moving at an average speed of 45 mph.

Collins said the first report of funnel activity near Manhattan came from an off-duty police officer.

"The first notification that we had was from an off-duty officer who called in that he saw a funnel cloud at the airport. At 5:18 p.m. we got notification from the National Weather Service of a tornado warning, and at 5:20 p.m. we sounded the sirens," he said.

There were never any reports of tornadoes on the ground, Collins said, only funnel clouds that failed to develop.

Damage from the storm was minimal, and mostly in the northwest Manhattan area, he said.

"We had some damage to street signs and a lot of tree damage on Scenic Drive and in northwest Manhattan. At least three structures in that area had minor damage also. Basically, if you could draw a line from the north edge of the airport to the south edge of the Sargent's addition, that's where we saw the wind damage," Collins said.

The storm continued to raise weather concerns east of Riley County, moving through Pottawatomie, Jefferson and Jackson counties where more funnel activity was reported, he said.

PIETASTERS

The horn riffs on this song are killer.

"Ocean" is soul-ska at its finest. After The Pietasters toured with the Mighty Mighty Bosstones, the Bosstones covered this song with members of The Pietasters in tow for the "Music For Our Mother Ocean 2" compilation. The deadly horn melodies carry "Ocean" along.

The best track on "Willis" has to be "Fat Sack."

If you don't dance to this song, either your legs are broken or you're dead. It's incredible. I can't wait to hear this one live, because it's going to be a definite live favorite.

Tom Goodin's guitar parts are incredibly energetic. Jackson sings and wails along like he's never sung and wailed before.

There's even a cool reggae/dancehall breakdown featuring DJ Selah toasting, then it explodes back into the original driving rhythm.

The Pietasters love old soul music and mix it into the band's sound very well. On "Stone Feeling," the members remove the ska from the mix and create a dynamic soul tune that sounds like it is some Motown outtake from the '60s.

When Jackson sings, "It's 3 o'clock in the mornin' and I've been drinkin' since half past noon," you just can't doubt him.

The Pietasters also choose great songs to cover. In the past, it has covered songs by Smokey Robinson, the Jam, Simaryp and more.

On "Willis," they cover tracks by The Outsiders, Jimmy Easter and an old soul song that I can't place.

The band's version of The Outsiders' "Time Won't Let Me" is more garage rock and soul than ska and features a phenomenal guitar solo from Goodin.

The band tips its hat to its old material by re-recording "Without You," which first appeared on its debut self-released album.

The sound on this version is far better than the original.

The cover of "Quicksand" is, once again, more soul than ska and is very true to the original version. There are even hand claps to provide more rhythm.

The band's cover of Jimmy Easter's "New Breed" sounds so much like the original it's scary. The horn sound is huge. I'd swear there are at least six horn players on it, and there are only three. There's too much soul in this song.

The album is closed by "Moment," which is a very traditional ska song, almost sounding a bit like the Skatalites. It's a perfect ending to a virtually perfect album.

"Willis" is a great record from one of the greatest bands kicking out real ska music for real ska fans today.

Forget pretenders like Goldfinger and Save Ferris and check out a real ska band, the Pietasters.

PARDON

raped her.

From the outset, the case was shaky. The alleged victim, eight months pregnant at the time, told police she was raped while lying in bed, her 2-year-old sleeping beside her.

The woman, who is black, told police it was a white man who raped her. Four months later, after seeing Byrd, a black man, in a grocery store, she told police he was the attacker.

Semen samples kept from his 1985 trial underwent testing this summer and failed to match Byrd's DNA. Testing of DNA was not available at the time of the trial.

Two weeks ago, state Rep. Ruth Jones McLendon, a black Democrat, criticized the Republican governor for issuing 13 of his 14 pardons to whites. The 14th pardon was given to a Hispanic. She called on fellow lawmakers to investigate the criteria he uses for issuing pardons.

Bush rejected that criticism again Wednesday.

"I strongly believe I did the right thing in setting a precedent," he said. "And for those who somehow made this a racial issue, I say to them they're absolutely, 100-percent wrong."

Byrd's lawyer, Randy Schaffer, suggested there might be a political motive in the slow movement on Byrd's pardon. Bush, son of the former president, is considered a contender for the presidential nomination in 2000.

Schaffer said he believes Bush was fearful Byrd could become a Willie Horton, the Massachusetts criminal who raped a woman while on a furlough. Bush's father used the Horton case to portray his 1988 Democratic rival, Michael Dukakis, as soft on crime.

"I think he's looking for a potential fall guy in case this doesn't work out, and now that he's got a piece of paper signed by the judge," Schaffer said Wednesday.

McDonald's proposal set for Monday meeting

The agenda for Monday night's Union Governing Board meeting contains a proposal from a McDonald's Restaurants corporate representative.

Virginia Coggins of the company's Kansas City office is scheduled to present a "proposal for food court." According to the agenda, discussion and action on the proposal will follow Coggins' presentation.

UGB members received a copy of the McDonald's proposal with their agenda, but the K-State Student Union director's office would not release a copy of the proposal Thursday afternoon.

Repeated attempts to reach Union Director Bernard Pitts for comment and to obtain a copy of the proposal were unsuccessful.

Hurricane Pauline kills at least 45

▶ WARM EL NIÑO CURRENTS fuel deadly hurricane's destruction.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

ACAPULCO, Mexico — Hurricane Pauline struck Mexico's most famous tourist resort with devastating fury Thursday, unleashing deadly torrents that swept people, cars and giant boulders toward storm-ravaged Pacific beaches.

At least 40 people died in Acapulco's floodwaters and five more elsewhere in Guerrero, the state in which the once-glittering resort of 2.9 million is located, said Gov. Angel Aguirre.

"This is a very sad day," Aguirre said on Mexican television. "We don't recall a hurricane ever having caused such damage."

Fueled by the warm El Nino ocean currents, Pauline powered towering waves up to 30 feet tall on parts of the coast, where the sea pounded pristine beaches to a rubble of broken palm trees and twisted lounge chairs.

Heavy rains turned streets into roaring rivers of debris. Water swept boulders the size of cars down the hills and flipped vehicles like toys, catching some with lights still on, their doors underwater. A coastal highway skirting the famed beaches teemed with raging water, and one man's body stuck from the mud, arms outstretched and mouth agape.

A hurricane warning was extended hundreds of miles up the coast, from Acapulco to the resort city of Puerto Vallarta, as satellite images showed Pauline moving roughly parallel to the shore, the U.S. Hurricane Center in Miami said.

President Ernesto Zedillo, on a state visit to Germany, ordered army troops into stricken areas along a long stretch of coast. Troops in Humvees poured into Acapulco by the hundreds to secure areas around homes wrecked by raging floods.

TV footage showed five bodies in the mud. Jaime Herandez, 40, who lives in the hills near Acapulco, said police took away at least seven bodies after mud and water came rushing down before dawn.

Red Cross spokesman Marco Antonio Santiago said at least 50 people were reported missing and authorities feared the death toll of 45 would rise.

"We've got rain coming down, mudslides blocking roads. Houses have fallen, walls are down," he said.

There were no reports of American or other tourists injured or dead. Many foreigners huddled in hotels while hundreds of Mexicans up and down the coast remained in emergency shelters.

RETURNING FROM BOSNIA

"YOU'RE ALWAYS GLAD TO COME HOME. THAT'S THE BEST PART OF ANY DEPLOYMENT."
MAJ. MIKE BEECH, TASK FORCE COMMANDER

FIRST LT. JASON Stacy kisses his son Justin, Thursday morning at Marshall Field as he returned from Bosnia. An advance party of 104 members of the Task Force arrived at Marshall Air Field at 2:30 a.m. Thursday. Their return had been delayed five times in 24 hours due to flight availability.

Anxious family members and friends waited into the wee hours of the morning to welcome home soldiers of Task Force 1-41 and the 977th military police who returned from Bosnia.

An advance party of 104 members of the task force arrived at Marshall Field at 2:30 a.m. Thursday. Their return had been delayed five times during 24 hours because of flight availability.

Maj. Mike Beech, commander of Task Force 1-41, said he's been in the Army for 14 years and has been deployed many times. "You never get used to it," Beech said. "You're always glad to come home. That's the best part of any deployment."

Beech said the most memorable thing about this deployment was the amount of destruction and waste in Bosnia.

"Big stark difference coming home and seeing how good we have it here in the United States compared to other places in the world," Beech said.

Beech's daughter, Caitlyn, said she had a lot to catch her father up on and was glad to have him home.

SPC Francis Thibodeau's wife and two sons were waiting to greet him. "Keep yourself busy. The days will go by quick. Be patient," was Cindy Thibodeau's advice to other spouses waiting for soldiers to return.

PFC Jason Brian had a new member of the family to welcome him home. His son, Jason Jr., was born during the deployment of the task force. Brian held his son for the first time in the midst of soldiers looking for their families and members of the news media scrambling for interviews. Fourteen babies were born to wives of Task Force soldiers during their deployment.

In a short ceremony in Hangar 817 on Marshall Field, Maj. Gen. Michael Dodson, commanding officer of Fort Riley, welcomed home the troops and expressed his thanks before releasing them to be reunited with their families and friends.

Dodson said what the soldiers provided in Bosnia was the separation of warring factions so that peace and tranquility can take place.

"These soldiers in their particular region served to have the fewest number of incidents of any region in Bosnia," Dodson said. "It's a credit to their training, it's a credit to their dedication, it's a credit to caring about their fellow man on a daily basis, interacting with people who didn't necessarily want to be friends."

Dodson said he was proud of what the soldiers had accomplished and thankful for all they did.

The rest of Task Force 1-41 is due to return to Fort Riley from Bosnia in four groups in the next few weeks.

All are expected back by the end of November.

UNC coach retires; K-Stater takes over

▶ DEAN SMITH STEPS DOWN with most college-basketball victories.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

CHAPEL HILL, N.C. — Dean Smith retired Thursday as North Carolina's basketball coach after 36 years, two national championships and more victories than anyone else in the history of the game.

Smith said he could not bring as much enthusiasm to the team as he once had.

"I enjoy basketball. I enjoy coaching basketball," Smith told a news conference. "It's the out-of-season stuff I didn't handle well."

Smith

Bill Guthridge, Smith's longtime assistant, will succeed him. Guthridge was a K-State assistant coach under Tex Winter from 1964 to 1968.

Athletic Director Dick Baddour said he would present Guthridge's name to UNC Chancellor Michael Hooker.

"He has learned well from the master, and he is ready and eager to do the job," Baddour said.

Guthridge said, "It's all the little things that wore Dean out," referring to his many public appearances, autograph signings and speeches.

The 66-year-old Smith fought back tears and sipped from a cup of water as he thanked his players and colleagues for their help.

"I'm the luckiest guy in the world ... to be at the University of North Carolina," Smith said.

He made his remarks in the basketball arena named for him. Also attending were his current team, Georgetown coach John Thompson and Philadelphia 76ers coach Larry Brown, who played for the Tar Heels.

Smith even got a call from President Clinton, a Guthridge played as a guard on Wildcat teams that won Big 8 Conference Championships from 1958 to 1960. In 1958, his sophomore year, K-State made the Final Four after winning the Midwest Regional Championship.

Guthridge has also been a part of some of the greatest teams in K-State basketball history — as a player in the 1958 Final Four and as an assistant coach with the Cats in 1964. He also helped the Tar Heels reach the Final Four 10 times as an assistant coach.

Rising costs, stable fee cause shortfall in Lafene's budget

MATT KREPS
staff writer

Lafene Health Center's budget will be $56,000 short this year. By fiscal year 2000, this number is expected to be $380,000.

Lannie Zweimiller, director of Lafene, said the shortfall is from rising costs from service providers and a stable Student Health Fee.

"They don't hold expenses down just because we don't get more money from our Student Health Fee," he said.

The shortfall does not mean Lafene will have a negative balance in its budget — at least not this year.

Lafene plans its budget on a long-term basis to keep student fees more stable while service costs increase at a steady rate. In order to do this, Lafene maintains a reserve budget every year.

When the Student Health Fee is determined by the Privilege Fee Committee, it includes projections for increasing costs over the years, Zweimiller said. The reserve builds up over time until costs equal income. The reserve is then used for several years to avoid raising fees.

Lafene's optimal reserve is 15 percent of its $4 million budget. This is enough money to replace equipment that breaks or to run the center for two months in the event of a total loss of income.

Fees are reviewed when the reserve falls below the 15

The price tag is going up on K-State Student Union renovations.

Union Director Bernard Pitts told Student Senate on Thursday night that another $800,000 will be necessary to complete every aspect of the planned remodeling. That would increase the total for the project to $11.5 million.

Pitts said the timing of the shortage is not ideal.

"Here we are within a couple of weeks of going out to bid for a general contractor, and we're seeing that we're going to be significantly short of funds on the project," Pitts said.

The shortage could be easily fixed, Pitts said, but that means students would pay the Union expansion privilege fee of $25 per semester for a longer period of time. The current plan calls for a 20-year bond for $9.2 million.

"We have an opportunity to possibly resolve that by taking funds from student fees that will be generated this semester and next semester and going back to the Board of Regents and see if they will authorize us to make the value of this project higher," he said.

Pitts highlighted several projects within the renovation

Service set for K-State student who died in two-car accident

MANHATTAN – The memorial service will be at 7 p.m. Sunday in Derby Food Center 133. Hallauer's friends and family, along with the Rev. Don Fallon, are planning the service.

"(The service) is near the people in the residence hall. The plan is for a more informal sharing of remembrances and celebrating Susan's life," Fallon said.

Hallauer was a junior in elementary special education and a resident of West Hall. She died as a result of injuries suffered in a two-car accident three miles from her home on Saturday. The funeral was Thursday in Soldier, Kan.

Friends are invited to contribute both oral and written memories for Monday's service.

DeGeneres threatens to quit show

NEW YORK – An angry Ellen DeGeneres is threatening to quit her ABC situation comedy because of battles about how to present homosexual-themed scripts and an adult content warning placed on Wednesday's show.

At the start of the "Ellen" episode in which DeGeneres' character, Ellen Morgan, kissed a female co-star, ABC flashed this sentence: "Due to adult content, parental discretion is advised."

DeGeneres told The New York Times that she and her executive producer, Tim Doyle, "are ready to walk off the show" because of the battles with ABC.

An ABC spokesman, Susan Sewell, said Thursday it was the first she'd heard about a threat to quit. She had no immediate comment on it.

The actress told TV Guide the only reason the episode is getting a warning label is because she is a lesbian.

DeGeneres said the aim of the series was to let homosexual kids know there's nothing wrong with being homosexual, "and now they're saying, 'Children shouldn't watch it.'"

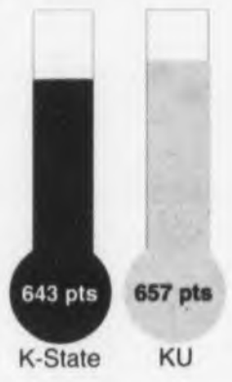
The Ellen character has yet to attempt a romantic kiss with another woman. Wednesday's kiss was described by a show spokeswoman as a joking one with actress Joely Fisher, who plays Ellen's heterosexual best friend, Paige.

Charges dropped in belt-beating of 12-year-old Connecticut girl

MILFORD, Conn. – Charges were dropped against a man who claimed his Arabic heritage allowed him to beat his 12-year-old daughter with a belt.

Judge Jack Grogins dropped the charges Wednesday against Riad Musallam after he agreed to undergo psychiatric counseling.

Musallam, a 44-year-old Palestinian immigrant, was booked last spring on charges of risk of injury to a minor and breach of peace.



State child welfare workers investigated after they were alerted by a nurse at the girl's school who found bruises on the child.

The girl told police her father had struck her six or seven times with a belt May 27 because he thought she had walked home with a boy.

The girl is now living with relatives and attending school in Jerusalem.

Corrections CLARIFICATIONS
In a story titled "Panelists address questions of hate speech on campus as part of Coming Out Week" on the front page of Thursday's Collegian, there was a factual error. The story said K-State is one of many universities that have speech codes banning hate speech. K-State has a disciplinary code that prohibits harassment and invasion of privacy that the ACLU supports. We regret the error.

Film concludes Coming Out Week

arts and entertainment editor

Despite the lack of drag queens, The Bisexual, Gay and Lesbian Society of K-State wound up National Coming Out Week with a reception and showing of the film "Stonewall."

The movie deals with the relationships of a young gay man in New York City during summer 1969. It concludes with a riot at the Stonewall bar between gay men and local police.

The movie was selected in August for Coming Out Week by a joint decision of Union Program Council and BGLS.

"We knew we wanted to do something for the end of the week. The Stonewall riots were the beginning of the gay rights movement, so we thought it was appropriate," said Paul Donovan, president of BGLS and senior in philosophy.

The week was organized mostly as a way for people to understand more about homosexual culture and topics. Three panel discussions were organized earlier in the week to allow subjects to be discussed at length. Topics covered were homosexuality and the law, coming out to family members and First Amendment rights.

"We've had a pretty good turnout, and I think we educated a few people," Jeremy Mittel, junior in interior design, said.

At the "Stonewall" showing and throughout the week, people besides members of the homosexual community have turned out to show their support.

"I'm here to help support all bisexuals, gays and lesbians," said Brenda Lea Mayberry, local National Organization for Women chapter president. "We're a strong supporter of BGLS. A lot of our members are members of this group also."

Even though BGLS hasn't done anything on this scale before, Donovan said the week went smoothly.

"We've learned a lot about how to work things. I think we'll try to do this again. Like most organizations, our leaders change from year to year, so it's hard to say," Donovan said.

"It's gone without any troubles. Fred (Phelps) hasn't shown up yet," Chad Salmans, junior in marketing, said.

For some BGLS members, this was the first time they had been really exposed to the local homosexual community.

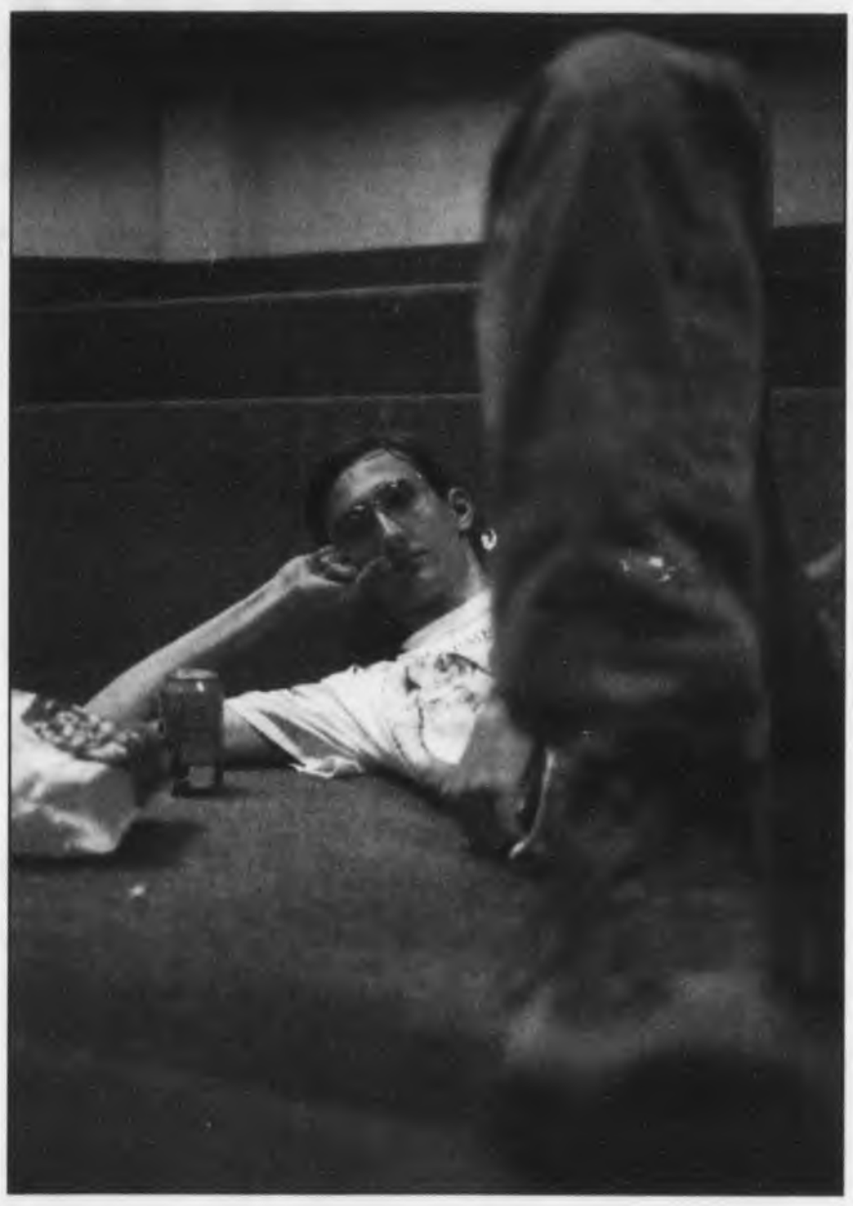
"It's a lot different than anything I've ever been to," Michael Stewart, junior in business administration, said. "I've been out since I was 18, but I've never been to any social gatherings. It's been fun."

This year's events were viewed by members as one of the better-planned Coming Out Weeks.

"Every year it seems to get a little bit better and better organized. I think as the group gets more cohesive, they get better at these types of events," said Sarah Ryan, graduate student in student counseling and personnel services.

As for the drag queens?

"Well, that's just one of those lessons of life. It would have been nice if they'd shown, but what can you do?" Donovan asked.



COMING OUT WEEK

The following events are part of Coming Out Week.

Friday Union Little Theatre 9:30 p.m.	Second showing of the film "Stonewall"
Saturday Riley County Seniors' Center 10 a.m.	Come out for breakfast Enjoy a free breakfast and cartoons as we celebrate the day and a successful week. Wear your pajamas.

The deadliest drama unfolded in working neighborhoods on the hills above the five-star ocean-front hotels as a 40-foot-wide torrent tumbled toward the sea.

"We felt our apartment building tremble because of the rocks the river was throwing against the foundations," said Elilasio Garcia, 22, who escaped one 10-story concrete building when a nearly dry gulch sprang to life.

Hundreds of modest homes of cement and wood tottered and collapsed into floodwaters and knee-deep torrents raced down many streets closer to Acapulco's beach, rushing to the sea.

At least 46 injuries, none serious, were reported in Oaxaca state by Red Cross and civil defense workers after Pauline barreled ashore near Huatulco on Wednesday, blowing down makeshift homes of plywood.

In a public housing project in Huatulco, children drew water from a dirty canal using buckets after the canal overflowed its banks and sent 3 feet of mud into homes there.

"The water took away everything," said Rosaura Aguilar Ramirez, 38. "It took our clothes. It took our dishes. Everything."

The storm started raking Acapulco before dawn Thursday as it moved northward up the coast toward the beach resorts of Zihuatanejo, Manzanillo and Puerto Vallarta.

In Puerto Angel, where Pauline first rumbled ashore on Wednesday, many houses that weren't made of concrete were washed away, said Federico Velazquez, a federal highway police official in radio contact with that city.

Waves up to 30 feet tall tore away the beachfront of the Huatulco Sheraton and other bays, leaving tree limbs scattered everywhere.

Sheila Butler, 78, of McAllen, Texas, said she had never seen a hurricane so strong. "We come from South Texas, so we've seen hurricanes, but this was a real strong one," she said.

Pauline nearly flattened the poor community of Las Tres Cruces, next to the Huatulco airport.

"Everything is gone," said 32-year old Evaristo Gerardo Mayo, surveying the humble neighborhood where pots and pans lay scattered amid broken glass and waterlogged mattresses.

Forecasters said El Niño, a phenomenon in which unusually warm waters disrupt weather patterns, apparently was to blame for the high number of powerful Pacific hurricanes this year.

Chimes leads Family Weekend planning; honorary family will be named at game

ANGELA BUCCIGROSSI
staff reporter

The members of Chimes Junior Honorary have spent the past few months working to make Family Weekend possible.

Choosing this year's honorary family was one of the largest responsibilities of Chimes' work with Family Weekend. The organization chose to help with this aspect of Family Weekend because of its strong commitment to family values.

"I think our organization is based a lot on having high moral standards, and a lot of that comes from the family. So we just wanted to honor them for all they do," Danelle Hanschu, Chimes honorary family chair, said.

Students nominated their families by writing an essay explaining why their families deserved the honor. Most essays were two to three pages long, Hanschu said.

"We kind of weighted it a little different this year. In the past, it's been more about involvement with K-State. We basically decided we wanted to go with just a family aspect of it, and the family that was chosen was also very involved in the community," Hanschu said.

The K-State honorary family will be announced at the halftime of this weekend's game against Missouri. The family will also be honored at a Chimes banquet before the game and awarded a plaque of recognition.

Along with selecting the family, Chimes members also helped by soliciting Manhattan businesses to help sponsor Family Weekend. The 26 members of Chimes received funding from 30 to 40 area businesses, each of which gave $20 or more to the organization.

Chimes members also spent time working on organization and idea development for the weekend and will work registration tables Saturday.

Union McDonald's could mean higher prices, loss of Stateroom grill

According to the sign, McDonald's Restaurants have served billions of customers.

Now the company wants to up that number by 20,000 with a move into the K-State Student Union.

A corporate representative for the fast-food chain is on Monday's Union Governing Board agenda to present a food court proposal. Simply put, the folks at McDonald's want the Union to be graced with the newest set of golden arches.

But before they launch into a series of Big Mac attacks, UGB members should carefully consider the McDonald's proposal and weigh both sides of the issue.

Yes, the addition of one of America's most popular franchises would have positive effects. A McDonald's would increase food variety and make the Union a more attractive alternative for those looking for a quick bite.

Adding another big-time food name to the Union's offerings would also serve to make the building live up to its slogan: "Host to the campus." More choices in the Union means fewer students and faculty leave campus for meals. In general, a McDonald's would serve as a drawing card, bringing more people and more revenue in the Union.

But the McDonald's proposal isn't all positive. There are drawbacks to the idea as well.

The addition of a McDonald's could mean the loss of the grill area in Union Stateroom — after all, they would be serving the same types of food. Would that also mean the loss of ever-popular Stateroom breakfast items?

The new eatery would most likely mean a price increase for students looking to grab a hamburger and fries between classes. Is the student body willing to pay for Happy Meal toys?

And finally, a possible McDonald's is the latest in a series of steps to make the Union a spitting image of Manhattan Town Center or any other mall — commercialism taken to the highest extreme.

UGB members will be well served to pay close attention to Monday night's proposal. The decision that accompanies it will be an important one.

ADMIRING ITS BEAUTY FROM AFAR? SURE, NO PROBLEM. BUT WHEN IT COMES DOWN TO INTERACTION, IT'S ...

NATURE vs. ME

Nature and I don't get along. Never have.

Two of my friends got to see this on a whole new level last Saturday when we went canoeing. I have only been canoeing twice, and both times it was on a lake. This time, however, we were paddling down a river.

An evil river.

Disregard the fact that I had just woken up, that the night before had been long and that I hadn't eaten. This river hated me.

KELLY FURNAS

KELLY FURNAS is a sophomore in print journalism. You can send e-mail to Kelly at krf5663@ksu.edu.

Somehow it managed to make us paddle against the current both ways. And once we started to make some progress, the water level would run low, and we would be stuck in a sand bank. At one point, we got so tired of paddling that we decided we would carry the canoe across a sand bank that would have taken a while to row around.

That was our biggest mistake.

It ended up that the "sand bank" was, in fact, two feet of mud. Not only could we barely walk through it, but the smell is still lingering on my legs. It was at that point when I started paddling with every ounce of energy I had. My friends were trying to motivate me by chanting, "Double Whopper with cheese."

But my real motivation came from wanting to be as far away from that river as I possibly could. I hated everything about that muddy water, the scorching sun and the littered shoreline. I despised nature.

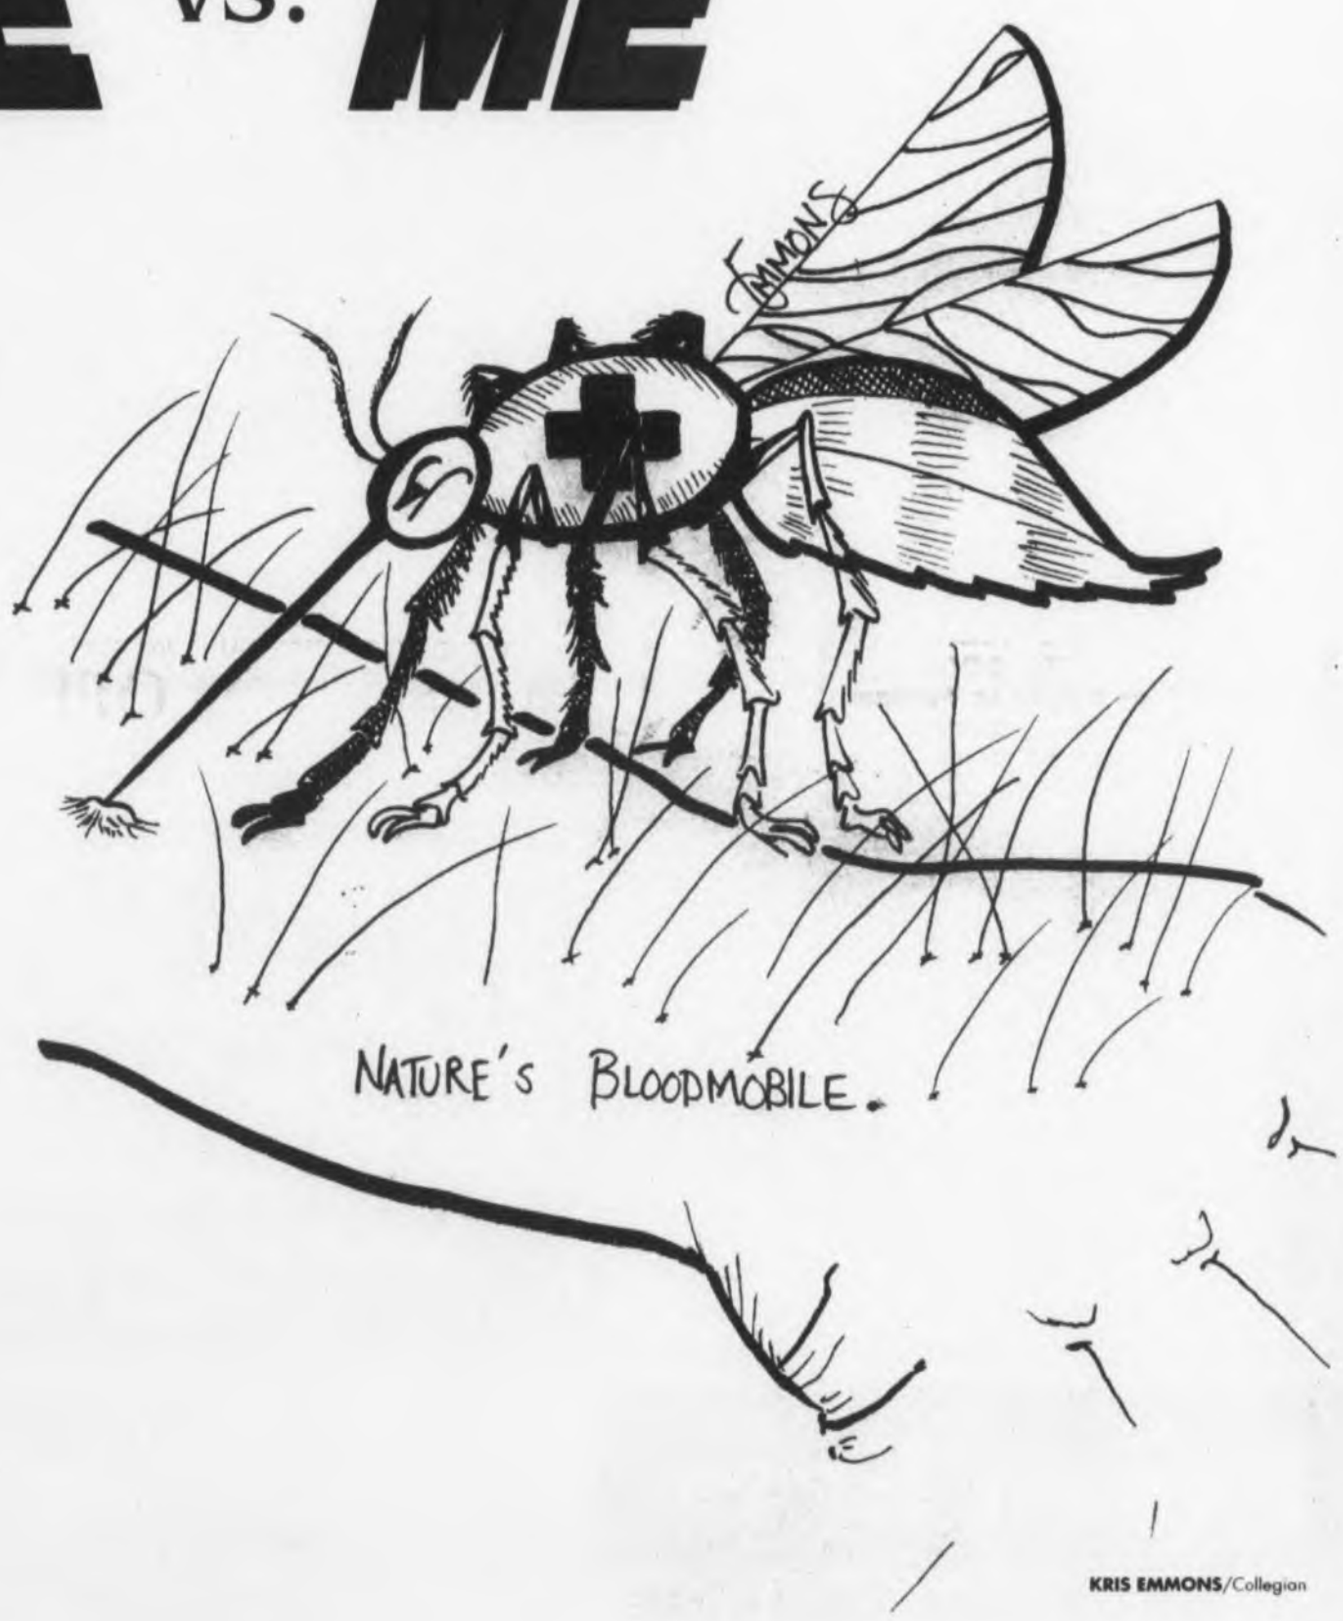
We finally finished our Mark Twain novel, and I went home to take a shower. I stood in there for nearly an hour trying to wash away the pure loathing I had toward the world around me. I was mad at the river, the trees, the grass — anything that was natural.

But what really irked me wasn't as much nature's presence as it was nature's unwillingness to cooperate with me. I had wanted so much to float down the river with the wind blowing through my hair as the gentle sun warmed my face. Instead, Satan-river turned my afternoon into upper body conditioning.

When it comes to interaction, nature and I never get along. I can admire sunsets and landscapes forever. I can observe animals or plants in their natural setting and be completely engrossed in their beauty. But as soon as I try to become involved in the setting, it seems like war. Nature doesn't want me touching it, and I don't want it touching me.

I will walk through a field of grass and be devoured by mosquitoes. I will trek through a wooded area and be slapped by tree branches. Poison ivy never hesitates to show up around me, either.

But I fight back sometimes — just ask any bug that has entered my house. Better yet, ask anything within a two-mile radius of my apartment the night I bought bug spray. I am ruthless when it comes to throwing rocks at crows and chasing squirrels up trees. I get a diabolical pleasure in kicking over dandelions or stomping on new grass.



So maybe I'm the one who's evil. After all, not everyone has such adverse feelings toward their surroundings.

My roommate, a wildlife biology major, always yells at me when I do anything that might resemble harming nature. If I forget to recycle, or I smash an insect, he tells me that I'm being unfair to the Earth. I tell him it is unfair that a bug is crawling around in my apartment without paying rent, but he doesn't seem to think that is a valid excuse for killing an innocent creature.

I suppose somewhere in my small, egotistical mind there is the thought that nature should service me. Whether I am camping or paddling down a river, nature should clear a path for me. On the same note, if I am in my apartment or in my car then nature should leave me alone. It's sort of a caveman's logic, but a logic that makes me appreciate the good aspects of nature even more.

When a butterfly lands next to me, or the sun reflects off a calm lake, I feel in awe of nature. When I see a hawk soaring through the sky, or when a tree shades me from a summer day, I feel a debt to the world around me. If I didn't hate nature so much, I don't think I would see all of the wonderful things it was trying to show me.

And maybe that would be the meanest thing I could do to nature.

Constitution doesn't separate church and state

KARL ALLEN

KARL ALLEN, a guest columnist, is a sophomore in arts and sciences. You can send your e-mail comments to Karl at kal5350@ksu.edu.

In the spirit of Coming Out Week, I thought I would write a column about another group that needs to come out — Christians. For some reason, we have become some sort of undercover CIA-agent Christians, afraid to let people know our beliefs.

Many people might not be aware of it, but this nation was founded by Christians, and we need to be proud of our heritage. The public school system today seems to be systematically changing history by editing out any references to Christianity in its curriculum, claiming it is necessary because of separation of church and state.

Let me clue you in on something. There is no reference to the separation of church and state in the Constitution or any other law. Go ahead. Look for it — you won't find it. The First Amendment states that Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.

The truth about the First Amendment is that it was adopted to prevent any one denomination from infringing upon another but was never intended to be hostile toward Christianity or designed to exclude Christianity from political life.

In 1796, just five years after the ratification of the First Amendment, the Maryland Supreme Court ruled, "By our form of government, the Christian religion is the established religion and all sects and denominations of Christians are placed upon the same equal footing and are equally entitled to protection in their liberty."

So where, you ask, did this myth of the separation of church and state come from? In 1947, 156 years after the Bill of Rights were ratified, the U.S. Supreme Court made a 180-degree turn. Without stating a single precedent, the court claimed, "The wall of separation between church and state must be kept high and impregnable."

With that single decision, the myth of separation of church and state was born. It was not established by our founding fathers, nor is it part of our national heritage.

Sixteen years later, the effects of this decision had cultivated a whole new thought system. In 1963, the Supreme Court removed Bible reading from public education. Why? Because it said it felt that, "If portions of the New Testament were read without explanation, they could be and have been psychologically harmful to a child."

Amazing, but it gets worse.

In 1967, the Supreme Court declared the following kindergarten nursery rhyme unconstitutional: "We thank you for the flowers so sweet. We thank you for the food we eat. We thank you for the birds that sing. We thank you for everything."

The Supreme Court's ruling in this case goes against all common sense. The Supreme Court argued that although the word "God" was not mentioned in this nursery rhyme, if someone were to hear it, it might cause them to think of God, and therefore, it was unconstitutional.

Go figure.

The myth of separation of church and state was propagated by the courts and never legislated into law. But because the courts seem to be making the laws these days, I would like to take a very brief review of the Constitution.

The very first article of the Constitution states that all legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States. Then, in Article 3, it states that the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one supreme court. Nowhere does it say the court has legislative powers.

I think Samuel Adams put it best when he said, "A general dissolution of principles and manners will more surely overthrow the liberties of America than the whole force of the common enemy. While the people are virtuous they cannot be subdued; but when once they lose their virtue they will be ready to surrender their liberties to the first external or internal invade."

Collegian's overlook of Promise Keepers prompts questions of news judgement

Editor,

A gathering was held on Saturday in Washington, D.C. Between 1 to 2 million men gathered to admit their mistakes and beg for the forgiveness of their wives, children, people of different races and denominations and God. They promised seven things.

1. To honor Jesus Christ and obey God's word
2. Pursue relationships with other men for accountability
3. Practice spiritual, ethical and sexual purity
4. Build strong families through love, protection and biblical values
5. Support their churches and pastors
6. Reach beyond racial and denominational barriers
7. Influence their world by obeying the Great Commandment (Mark 12:30-31) and the Great Commission (Matthew 28:19-20)

These men made commitments to honor their wives, children, other people — regardless of race or denomination — and Jesus Christ. They promised to make the world a better place for all people. CNN, FOX News and C-SPAN all had live coverage of the event. This was the largest religious gathering in the history of the United States.

However, it was not worthy of coverage in our esteemed newspaper, the Collegian. It was not even worthy of a paragraph in the NewsRewind section.

An event that draws that many people together anywhere in this country for a common cause is a significant news story. I wonder what constitutes good and worthy news and what doesn't, and who makes that decision.

Racial harassment, civil rights abuses defined

SHEYENE FOSTER
staff writer

Possible solutions to racial harassment and civil rights abuses were the themes of a lecture Thursday morning.

Angela Bennett, director of the U.S. Department of Education's Office for Civil Rights in Kansas City, Mo., said there has been an increase of racial hostility in the United States, especially on the part of children.

Racial & Ethnic Harmony

"Eighty percent of race or hate crimes are committed by juveniles," Bennett said.

However, the main focus of Bennett's speech was defining which of these types of crimes would fall into her department's jurisdiction and what they do to solve such problems.

Discrimination based on factors such as race, nationality, age, sex and disability are all responsibilities of the Office for Civil Rights. These are defined by the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and a number of federal regulations and related acts.

Bennett said the Office for Civil Rights addresses only cases of discrimination and hostile environments that might be linked to an educational institution. She said there are many factors to be considered in determining jurisdiction.

"Just because it walks like a duck, and it quacks like a duck, does not necessarily mean it's a duck," Bennett said.

Bennett did, however, point out that her department offers a variety of services that could be applicable for students and faculty at a university or other educational institution.

"We are here for you, not just for complaints and issues of compliance, but also for technical assistance," Bennett said.

During the question-and-answer session, an audience member gave testimony of her experience with discrimination at K-State.

Tibi Marin, a graduate student from Venezuela, said discrimination against people because of their racial background still exists.

"This is the thing we have to fight at this university," Marin said. "People looking down on you because of your background."

Marin described the pain of the discrimination she has experienced. Many in the audience, including Marin herself, were in tears.

"I suffer with the pain every day," Marin said. "And there's nothing I can do about it. How do you deal with that pain inside every day?"

Bennett said she appreciated Marin's testimony. Bennett said hearing about true experiences makes the issue real to those who have not been directly exposed to such discrimination.

"People need to hear that," Bennett said. "This shows that its not an issue that belongs to somebody else. It's an issue which belongs to everybody."

Bennett encouraged Marin to speak with university officials about her problems. Several faculty members also spoke with Mavin during the session, offering assistance and ways to deal with the discrimination against her.

Bennett said her department recognizes the importance of addressing issues of discrimination within the educational system.

"We recognize that abuse and harassment is one of our most insidious barriers to equal rights and an equal education," Bennett said.

CLIF PALMBERG/Collegian

STUDENTS AND faculty listen to Angela Bennett on Thursday in the Union Big 12 Room. Bennett, director of the U.S. Department of Education's Office for Civil Rights, talked about racial harassment.

However, Bennett said the situation is not hopeless.

"Together, as we go forward, we can eliminate this problem of racial discrimination, sex discrimination, age discrimination and discrimination based on disability," Bennett said.

Don't wipe away the memory of the dominating Nebraska offense just yet. Missouri is coming to town, and Coach Bill Snyder said the two offensive systems have much in common.

"There are some similarities, a great similarity, I think, between their offense and Nebraska's offense and what they try to do," Coach Bill Snyder said.

Missouri runs the option that has troubled the Cats' defense in the Ohio and Nebraska matchups. But coming off the loss to the Huskers on Saturday, Snyder said he thinks his team will bounce back.

"In the past, we have bounced back, and it was important for us to do so, but I certainly didn't want them to take it for granted that it would happen just because it happened in the past," Snyder added. "I have great faith in our players that they're not going to let one defeat destroy their season."

The players also refuse to let Nebraska beat them twice.

"We have to learn from our mistakes and come back and play Missouri," senior running back Eric Hickson said after the game in Lincoln. "We just have to come together and bounce back and correct our mistakes."

Besides correcting mistakes, the Cats also have the option offense, coordinated by Tiger quarterback Corby Jones.

Jones, a junior, has never started against K-State. His redshirt was pulled in 1995 the week after the Cats/Tigers game in Manhattan. In 1996, he was nursing a hip injury during the felines' matchup.

But the Cats are expecting this Tiger team to work.

"I can't remember facing a better Missouri team," Snyder said.

Jones is second in the Big 12 conference in total offense. Against Iowa State on Saturday, he posted career highs by completing 12 in 14 attempts, passing for 213 yards and accumulating 294 yards in total offense for a game.

Sound like anyone you know? How about Cats quarterback Michael Bishop?

"I guess their style of play is a little bit similar, maybe more than a little bit," Snyder said. "Corby has had more experience in the system that he's in than Michael has in the system that he's in."

But Jones has had three years with the Tigers, whereas Bishop has had four games with the Cats.

"Corby probably executes what he does maybe a little better than Michael does right now," he added. "Maybe a lot better than Michael does right now."

What also makes Jones dangerous to the Cats is his ability to scramble and run. To date, he has racked up a team-leading 429 rushing yards with 95 against Ohio State.

"Jones can run with the ball against Ohio State, who I consider to be a fine defensive football team," Snyder said. "He got some key plays on the options keeping the ball."

However, Tiger senior tailback Brock Olivo follows Jones with 320 rushing yards this season.

"There's nobody that I have any greater respect for than Brock Olivo and what he's done," Snyder said. "You can't assume the ball is going to stay in Corby Jones' hands all the time in the running game, and I'm sure it won't."

If all this sounds a little like what the Cats

NBC wins battle in baseball's other postseason duel

Watching baseball's league championship series, I've noticed several things, one of which I've always known: National League ball is much more fun to watch.

But that's just a personal preference. I enjoy the pace, strategy and subtlety of NL ball.

But this year, it really is more fun to watch, beyond the product on the field. Granted, given a choice between a Marlins-Braves game or an Indians-Orioles game, I'd watch Florida and Atlanta tangle 100 percent of the time. But this year especially, there's no contest.

VIEWPOINT

DAN MERKER

DAN MERKER is a senior in computer science. You can send your e-mail comments to Dan at dmerker@ksu.edu.

The American League Championship Series is on FOX (I can hear Rupert Murdoch crying from Australia now that the Yankees are gone), and the National League Championship Series is on NBC.

I will give FOX credit for taking baseball all season. It's nice to have a network game of the week on every Saturday, but their coverage is not good. At least they try. Their patented "Fox Box" has changed the way all sports are broadcast, forcing all networks to continually have the score and clock (or inning) on some corner of the screen. Their "hot zone," a dissection of the strike zone for each hitter, is horrible. It's rarely accurate, and somehow, Ken Griffey Jr. has a "hot, hot, hot zone."

Other than that, there's not too much there. FOX buys names. Many of their anchors are descendants of classics — Joe Buck and Chip Caray to name a few — but they're just not very good. Their analysts try too hard. Just because someone played baseball doesn't make him good on television. The exception to this is Steve "Psycho" Lyons. You've got to love someone who once dropped trou while standing on first base.

NBC's coverage is totally different. The game doesn't even have to be good because Bob Costas, Bob Uecker and Joe Morgan make the telecast enjoyable.

Costas is perhaps the classiest of all sportscast-

Crew preparing for Head of the Charles competition in Boston

MICHAEL RYAN
staff reporter

With only one regatta under its belt, the women's varsity rowing team is only a week away from sending nine of its members to compete in one of the most prestigious fall regattas in the world.

The Head of the Charles competition is Oct. 19, in Boston. The K-State crew will compete on the 5,000-meter course against an estimated 45 teams, said Jenny Hale, K-State women's crew coach.

The U.S. National team will be competing at the regatta along with crews from Europe, Canada and other U.S. teams. Hale said she is excited about her team getting the opportunity to compete in the event.

"This will be the first time for them to jump in with the best in the the world," Hale said. "Our goal is to go up there and be competitive.

"If you're doing well in the Head of the Charles, then it bodes well for the spring season."

Senior co-captain Kathy Gaitros is expecting the regatta to be educational.

"I see it as a learning experience. It's going to be a real challenge hanging with those guys," she said.

"It will tell us where we're at and where we'll be in a few years."

Hale said the event could attract between 300,000 to 350,000 fans if the weather is good, something her team is looking forward to.

Junior co-captain Amanda Kiefer said the crowd will have the team pumped up.

"It's incredible. There's nothing like rowing when people are cheering," she said. "It's exciting that we get this opportunity. It's a very distinguished race."

The crew team is only in its second year as a varsity sport.

Coach Hale said there are now 60 women on the novice and varsity roster, most of whom did not row until they got to college.

For instance, Kiefer started rowing after she saw a boat on campus last year, and Gaitros started after she saw a flier at fee payments last year.

Hale said the squad members have come a long way.

"Given the context that none of them knew how to hold an oar or sit in a boat, they've come far," Hale said.

Gaitros said she is impressed with how Hale has run the young program.

"What I like most about her coaching is she's taking us places and we're making moves," Gaitros said. "Everything that she's done has benefited the team. She's constantly helping us see our potential."

After the Head of the Charles, the team has three competitions left. The Head of the Iowa is Oct. 25-26, in Iowa City, and then the team returns to Manhattan for its final two races at Tuttle Creek on Nov. 1 and 8. The racing gets under way about 8 a.m. on Nov. 1 and 9 a.m. on Nov. 8. Coach Hale encourages fan support at the races.

Women who would like more information on becoming a part of the rowing team should contact Coach Hale at 532-7027.

Ground game relies on senior leader to keep offense moving downfield

JESS C. LOUK
staff writer

Simply said, making sure the offense moves the ball is what it's all about for team captain and left tackle Todd Weiner.

The K-State Wildcats might have suffered a 56-26 loss to the Nebraska Cornhuskers last week and in the process stalled on offense, but Husker defensive end and all-America Grant Wistrom didn't play a large role in the defeat.

Weiner

On nearly every snap, Weiner battled Wistrom, trying to keep him away from quarterback Michael Bishop. And most of the time, Weiner won the battle in the trenches.

Unfortunately for Weiner and the Cats, the overall war wasn't won, and the Cats lost for the last time with Weiner at tackle.

"When I woke up Sunday, it hurt pretty good," Weiner said.

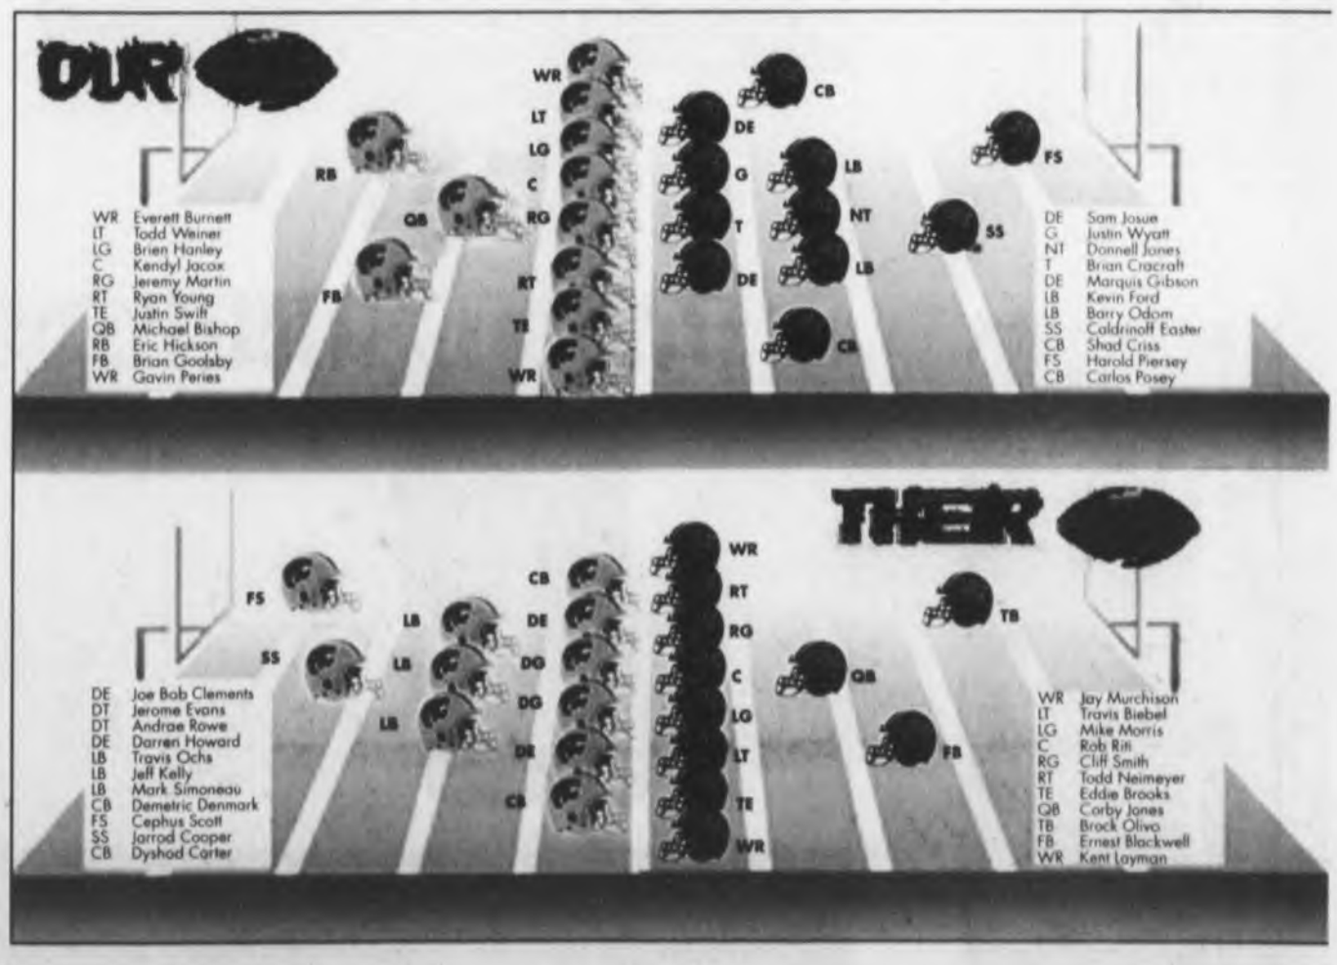
"It was a pretty bad strain. I came up Sunday to watch some film because it stung and I had to try and move on."

This week Weiner and the rest of the Cats are preparing to take on Missouri Saturday at KSU Stadium. Weiner will strap on his helmet just like last week and try to shut down Missouri's defensive end.

Since Snyder arrived in 1989, the Cats have posted a 3-3-1 record afterNebraska losses, with the exception of the Dec. 5, 1992 Coca-Cola Bowl in Tokyo. The Cats' last game of the season was with the Huskers. Still, recent success has been promising.

"We've bounced back before," Weiner said. "However, that doesn't mean it will happen again. It's not something we can take that for granted."

This week, Weiner won't be lining up against an all-American, but he is approaching the game as if he were. Week in and week out, Weiner's teammates sing his praises for his hard work and athletic ability.



"When you're playing against Todd, you really have to have great technique and great leverage," right guard Jeremy Martin said. "So many defensive ends try to use their speed to get up field, either to the outside, or they try to use an inside move. With Todd, you can't do that. He's just so quick off the ball."

Weiner has slowly made a name for himself around the Big 12. As a junior last season, Weiner was voted third-team all-Big 12 in both the coaches' polls and The Associated Press polls.

But don't be fooled into thinking that Weiner's 6-foot-5-inch, 300-pound frame is the only reason for the decorations he has received. All the work Weiner does on the field he'll tell you is to get better day by day. But in the back of every senior's mind looms the NFL.

If Weiner is drafted or makes a splash in the NFL, he won't be the first in the Weiner clan to play in the NFL. Weiner's grandfather, Sid, played for the Detroit Lions.

"He doesn't really talk about going to the league very much, and that's probably the best way to go about it," Martin said. "I definitely think he has the tools to do it. It's just whether or not we go out and have a good season."

ers. He is the perfect blend of a sports fan, poet, comedian and storyteller. He seems to know everything necessary and actually gets excited about exciting things, without being like Kevin Harlan or John Madden. I can just tell that when something happens like Bobby Thompson's "Shot Heard 'Round the World" or Kirk Gibson's blast in the 1988 World Series, Costas will come up with an unforgettable call that will accompany the play in history.

Morgan is a Hall-of-Famer who is good in the booth. His analysis is generally right on, and he doesn't treat viewers like they don't know how many bases are on the diamond. Morgan only chimes in when necessary, and doesn't begin every sentence with, "When I played ..." He really knows the game and uses his insight as a former player well.

Uecker is somewhere in between Costas and Morgan. He was a player but is now a broadcaster for the Milwaukee Brewers. He is comfortable in the booth and isn't too different from Harry Doyle, the announcer in "Major League." He's pretty funny, despite "Mr. Belvedere."

The three mold perfectly and make an outstanding team. It is a privilege to hear them broadcast a game. That team, along with the new graphic of a pitch's movement, including where it fell in relation to the strike zone, make for perfect baseball coverage. Fortunately, NBC has the rights to this year's World Series.

Watch an NBC game, but don't let the announcers fall into the background. Listen to them and enjoy. There could be no more enjoyable experience for the World Series, except a Pirates victory.

tried to do against Nebraska, you may be right. The Cats' offensive strategy for this game, according to junior wide receiver Darnell McDonald, will be to mix it up.

"As long as we're running it and then having a little play-action, then we shouldn't have any problems," McDonald said. "As long as they're conscious of the run, and then we get open for the pass and get a couple of deep passes, everything will be just fine."

The passing game started to come together at times in Lincoln. McDonald was on the receiving end for two passes — one for a touchdown.

But McDonald said he likes to see Bishop contribute to the rush.

"He drops back in the pocket and then comes a pass rush and a quarterback draw, and if he breaks loose, he might go 90 yards for a touchdown," he said. "If he doesn't, then it's just a tough loss for the team."

Snyder said he saw a determination spread throughout Monday's practice after the Huskers, and quite a few players stepped up their intensity to prepare for the Tigers this weekend.

"There was a bit of anger there, and it was expressed in the right way," Snyder said. "There is an awful lot of football left to be played. There are still some other things still out there to achieve."

Bulbs, trees adorn island

TONYA ALLOWAY
staff reporter

About nine months ago a group of people in the community decided to do something to beautify the Manhattan streets. Last weekend, their planning and hard work finally paid off.

A group of about 40 people, made up of Master Gardeners, West Campus Neighborhood Association and other community members, planted trees, shrubs and ornamental grasses in the island at the intersection of Sunset Avenue and Claflin Road on Saturday.

"After working on it all year, it's wonderful to see it come together," Carol Kennedy, Riley County Master Gardeners member, said.

This Sunday the College Hill 4-H group and Master Gardeners will add mums, daylilies, and bulbs that will come up next spring.

"It's a beautification project to the neighborhood, but also as an entrance to that side of campus," said Alan Ladd, county extension director for the Riley County office of Research and Extension.

The city of Manhattan gave $1,000 to the project. The neighborhood association also donated money to the project.

The College Hill 4-H Club received a grant through the YES! fund, which focuses on youth projects.

Master Gardeners and West Campus Neighborhood Association will keep up the site, but the nature of the area is to be unkept.

"The idea was to get plants that are native to Kansas and that require low maintenance," Kennedy said.

She said the group tried to choose plants that would create interest in all four seasons and wouldn't die off every year.

The group prepared the soil and planned the design of the project in the summer.

They also took into account the line-of-sight at the stop light. All of the taller trees were planted away from the stop light, and the shorter flowers will be nearer to the stop light.

Kennedy said the island shows a standard that can be expected from the Master Gardeners and the neighborhood.

"It says what a community can do when they pull together to do a project like this."

The Master Gardeners class lasts eight weeks and is offered through the Riley County Extension Office.

ARH sponsors panel on minority students, discusses multicultural issues, programming

JULIE LINDAMOOD
staff reporter

On the whole, K-State is for everybody, but minor details such as Aggieville leave minority students out, Mikail Abdel-Khaliq, sophomore in business, said.

"Aggieville is for entertainment of the campus, but more or less the minorities don't really fit in because it is not really our music or our style or our thing that we go to," Abdel-Khaliq said.

Abdel-Khaliq brought up this issue in Thursday night's panel on minority students in residence halls. More than 75 people attended the panel at Van Zile Hall, which was sponsored by the Kansas State University Association of Residence Halls.

"I hope tonight will get students to think about the issues," Anna Levings, KSUARH multicultural programming coordinator, said.

The forum addressed issues that affect minority students' everyday lives, Abdel-Khaliq said.

"It made us think past that into a higher level," he said.

Colette McLemore, Black Student Union president and senior in social science, said to help make K-State's campus more positive, the programming must diverse.

The American ethnic studies program, the ARH Multicultural Committee and the Union ProgramCouncil Multicultural Committee are some of the things that McLemore said help K-State's campus.

"K-State's campus is really positive," McLemore said.

Color is unimportant in the whole scheme of things, Abdel-Khaliq said.

"It's all about communication because everybody is here for the same reason. Everybody is here for an education," he said.

Levings said the panel is one way KSUARH is trying to help minority students realize they aren't alone, and there are resources out there to help them.

Everyone on campus needs to get in touch with one another and get to know one another better, Abdel-Khaliq said.

"If we get in touch with each other, the opportunities are unlimited," he said.

City projects challenge director

> I look at it as a challenge in a way that we can have fun with our jobs.
> • Jerry Petty
> Public Works diirector

BRANDI HERTIG
staff reporter

Jerry Petty's desk, cluttered with pink message slips, sits among tangled cords, boxes and other people's desks. The screen saver on his computer flashes, "Countdown — 15 months and we get to go home!!"

Petty

Home is City Hall. Temporary residence is a white-brick walled room in the Manhattan Fire Department.

"I look at it as a challenge in a way that we can have fun with our jobs," Petty said.

Petty, who has worked for the city of Manhattan for almost 23 years, the last year and a half as director of public works, said challenge is one of the things that makes his job enjoyable.

Petty administers engineering, transportation and building maintenance for Manhattan. The renovation of City Hall is one of the challenges that falls under his watch. He said that in addition, the scheduled widening of Anderson Avenue has helped keep his interest alive.

"It's one of those tangible projects," he said. "It's more than a plan."

Another tangible project of Petty's, and the one he said he's most proud of, is the redevelopment of the downtown area. During the years between 1978 and late 1987, Petty said he worked with everything imaginable, from the public works perspective to the building of more railroads to buying and demolishing 80-plus properties.

"Without question, that was the key thing I helped with," he said.

In 1994, Petty received the American Public Works Association Top 10 Award, an honor that goes to only 10 nominees in the United States and Canada.

Petty said he doesn't seek awards, but this is the one he is most proud of.

Petty is from Sharon Springs, Kan. He graduated from K-State in 1973 with a degree in civil engineering. He said he'd didn't intend to call Manhattan home.

"I never dreamed I'd be in Manhattan for 23 years," he said.

Now that he has been, Petty said he'd like to retire here, though he won't actually be retiring in the literal sense of the word.

"When I say 'retire,' I'll still continue to work," he said.

Describing himself as an avid outdoorsman who doesn't know how he ended up with a desk job, Petty said he's keeping his eyes open for post-retirement employment.

"I may go into something crazy," he said. "I just don't know what that's going to be yet."

Petty, who has had six different jobs in Manhattan, said each job he's taken has provided a continuous progression with more responsibility and more authority.

"I haven't taken any backwards steps," he said.

As far as stepping up to a higher position before he retires, which he said would be in more than five years but less than 10, Petty said he's not sure if that will happen.

"Short of going into city management, there isn't anything left," he said. "I'll cross that bridge if it ever comes."

When Petty isn't actively directing public works, he's also a father and a husband. He said there's nothing more important to him than his children, Amy and Tim, and his wife, Jo.

"My family is very important to me — more so than my job," he said.

More than 750 Wichita traffic violators find amnesty

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WICHITA — Municipal Court Administrator Roger Clark said the line was quick but steady.

More than 750 people have shown up at City Hall this week to pay their traffic fines during Wichita's amnesty program.

"We've had a lot of people who were surprised to see themselves on the list," Clark said.

The names were printed in a flier inserted in the Sunday edition of The Wichita Eagle. This week, anyone on the list can go to City Hall to pay fines and court costs. In return, the city will waive the $10 to $15 warrant fee for each ticket not paid within the allotted time.

The city also will drop the person's arrest warrants. Those who don't pay could be arrested the next time they are pulled over on a traffic violation.

Parking tickets are issued in the name of the first person to whom the vehicle is registered. So some people made it onto the list even though it was their spouse or child who was using the vehicle and got the ticket, Clark and Wichita Police Chief Mike Watson said.

There were some errors, though. Wichita police Detective Paul O'Mara's name erroneously made it onto the list. He had parking tickets from 1995 but paid them in March. He has a clean record now, so why is he still on the list?

"That's what I want to know," O'Mara said. "I haven't been able to get an answer."

City employees were told the list was coming out and were asked to check their status last month. If they paid before the list was printed, their names would not be included. The same offer was extended to the public.

plan he said couldn't be completed without extra funding.

Original plans for the Union expansion included custom cabinets for the bookstore, computer store and other spaces in the building. That wouldn't be possible with the current spending ceiling on the Union project, he said.

"All of those areas were going to have new cabinetry that would be custom-built for those areas, but we wouldn't be able to do that now. We'd finish the renovation and then have to roll in the old cabinets that we have now," Pitts said.

Renovations to the Cats' Pause Lounge and state-of-the-art, more sound-proof partitions for the ballroom also wouldn't be possible unless more funds were made available, Pitts said.

Two other aspects of the renovation plan would also be affected by a lack of money, he said. Forty-year-old floor tile throughout the building couldn't be replaced, and changes to Forum Hall, including new carpet and reupholstered seats, also wouldn't be possible, Pitts said.

"Without the additional funding, there's a variety of things that it doesn't look like we will be able to do," he said.

During questions from senators, Pitts stressed that the privilege fee for Union expansion won't be increased. Instead, students would pay it for more semesters, he said.

"We're not asking for any additions in the student fee. We're still looking at the $25 per semester that was illustrated four years ago," Pitts said. "Students would not pay more per semester, but would pay the same amount for possibly more semesters."

Pitts said he attended the meeting to receive comments from student senators about the proposal, but only two questions were posed during his presentation, and no senators commented about the plan.

WHAT ELSE HAPPENED AT STUDENT SENATE?

Resolutions 97/98/32, 97/98/33 and 97/98/34 passed by unanimous consent. Senators approved the appointment of Matt Killingsworth and T.J. Schreiner as senators from the College of Architecture, Planning and Design and the College of Arts and Sciences, respectively, to fill Senate vacancies.

Josh Rengstorf was appointed as Student Senate Parliamentarian, Jenny Perkins as Student Senate Secretary, and Stacey Chapman as a representative to the Judicial Council. All three were also filling vacancies for the respective positions.

Resolution 97/98/31 passed by unanimous consent. The objection to the proposed traffic roundabout for North Manhattan Avenue and Claflin Road passed without debate. Copies of the resolution will be sent to numerous organizations involved in and affected by the traffic-control device.

Bill 97/98/26 passed 57-0. Without debate, senators approved the bill, which clarified statutes that dealt with the Allocations Committee. The bill repealed numerous outdated statutes dealing with the committee and changed references to the former Finance Committee to Allocations Committee, the group's current name.

Bill 97/98/27 passed 57-0. This bill provides for the return of funds to the Student Governing Association Reserves for Contingencies Account if they were not used by the campuswide organization to which they were allocated. It passed without debate.

college basketball fan.

"There is nobody like you," Clinton said. "But not just because you won, but because of the way you did it. We all respect and admire you so much."

Smith thanked Clinton and told him he had just finished a round of golf with Michael Jordan.

Guthridge said he was excited and would try to continue Smith's run of athletic and academic success.

"This isn't quite the way I had envisioned this whole scenario over the years," Guthridge said. "I had hoped Dean and I could go out together and ride off into the sunset in five years.

"I think it is a very difficult situation to follow the greatest coach of all time," Guthridge said. "But we expect to win here."

Smith's retirement shocked most everyone in the basketball world. He had said earlier this year he planned to honor his contract through 2001.

"I take each year as it comes," Smith said in March, "and I won't make that decision in April, because every April I am probably (tired). So, you wait to see how excited you are in August. For 36 years, I guess I've been excited in August and September. If that ever changed up until 2001, then I would make that decision."

Smith and Guthridge, 60, have been virtually inseparable through the years. Guthridge turned down several coaching opportunities to remain on Smith's staff.

Smith leaves at the top of his profession, taking the Tar Heels to his 11th Final Four last season.

He also guided the team to his 13th Atlantic Coast Conference tournament title during the 1996-97 campaign, which started with his first 0-3 league start.

The Tar Heels are just nine days away from opening practice and are considered one of the contenders for the 1998 national title. Smith won that title twice.

"Coach Smith left a message for me, and when I called him back, he just came out and told me he was retiring," said Kris Lang, a senior at Gastonia Huss High School who plans to play for UNC during the 1998-99 season.

"He said he hoped I understood, and I said I did," Lang said. "He told me he was still going to be around. He just wasn't going to be coaching anymore."

Smith, with a career record of 879-254, broke Adolph Rupp's career- victory mark of 876 last season during the NCAA Tournament in Winston-Salem. He won national titles in 1982 and 1993.

Smith's teams have finished in the top three of the Atlantic Coast Conference for a record 33 straight seasons, including last season's second-place mark.

The Tar Heels under Smith also posted an NCAA-record 27 consecutive 20-win seasons.

Smith's only losing season came in his first, when the Tar Heels went 8-9 in 1961-62.

He has coached 30 all-Americans, including Jordan, Jerry Stackhouse, James Worthy, Sam Perkins, Mitch Kupchak, Charlie Scott and Billy Cunningham.

GUTHRIDGE

Kansas Coaches' Association.

Guthridge, 60, has usually been mentioned as a replacement whenever there is a head coaching vacancy at a prominent university. In 30 seasons in Chapel Hill, Guthridge has turned down several premier coaching offers and withdrawn his name from consideration for many others.

"I really have been fortunate to be surrounded with great assistants the entire time I have been head coach," former Head Coach Dean Smith said. "He (Guthridge) would be a tremendous head coach. My former assistants here, Ken Rosemond, Larry Brown, John Lotz, Eddie Fogler, Roy Williams and Randy Wiel, have all been successful as Division I head coaches."

percent mark.

"That's just being financially responsible if you have that luxury, and that is a big luxury," Zweimiller said. "We still have a reserve. Basically, what I'd like to do is keep that around 15 percent or $600,000 over the next four years."

Lafene depends on student fees for about 56 percent of its budget. The rest comes from service charges on X-rays, lab work and pharmacy activity. By using student fees, Lafene can offer medical care at low rates for its users, Zweimiller said.

"We continue to try to keep the prices low so they're affordable," Zweimiller said.

Lafene has two options to increase revenue. It can raise service costs or increase student fees. Raising costs could price health care out of some students' budgets. The best alternative is to look at student fees, Zweimiller said.

The Student Health Advisory Committee will make suggestions on how to increase Lafene's funding by the middle of November, said Kristi Herrman, chair of the SHAC Budget/Fee Review Committee.

University Counseling Services will also be involved in the process. Herrman said the committee will work with Dr. Fred Newton from Counseling Services to include a well-rounded budget proposal.

"We're still going through the numbers," she said.

The committee is made up of K-State students who make recommendations to Lafene. Lafene is not required to use the committee's suggestions, but Herrman said she is confident the outcome will be positive.

"We're a pretty committed group of students. Dr. Zweimiller and Dr. Newton really respect our opinions," she said.

'A Lie of the Mind'

Play provides realism in unreal way

JEFF COOPER/Collegian

MIKE, PLAYED by Joel Bicknell, graduate student in speech, comforts his sister Beth, played by Shelley Befort, senior in theater, in a production by K-State Theatre, "A Lie of the Mind." The play, by Sam Shepard, will be performed at 8 tonight and Saturday night and Oct. 15-18 in Nichols Theatre.

Review
Theater

▶ The play will be in Nichols Theatre at 8 tonight and Saturday night and Oct. 15-18. Tickets are $6 for students and $8 for the general public.

ANDREA COREY
senior staff writer

"A Lie of the Mind," performed by K-State Theatre, was good and realistic in a most unlikely kind of way.

The story goes like this. Boy beats girl senseless, then realizes he was really, really wrong. Girl is brain-damaged, but still manages to be far smarter than her own parents and everyone else.

Granted, the premise of this story is unlikely, but the message is clear. We all wear costumes in life, and we are all actors whether it is literal or figurative.

The play opens as Jake (played by Jason Miller) is talking about how he killed Beth (Shelley Befort), his wife. But he didn't really kill her, at least in the flesh-and-blood way. Jake's brother, Frankie (Scott Chamoff), tries to help Jake realize he didn't kill Beth.

As mentioned before, it turns out that Jake didn't really kill Beth, but did leave her brain-damaged.

Throughout the story, we meet both Beth and Jake's parents, and their siblings, and this family interaction makes the story real. In fact, meeting Beth's parents is a lot like the interaction between the Costanzas on "Seinfeld," which helps lighten the difficult nature of the story. I did actually laugh out loud, which doesn't happen often.

The play does, at times, seem real — in real life, finding out what someone's family is like can help define why they are the person they are. Throughout the play, we find out bits and pieces of what happened to Jake's father. We also meet Beth's parents and hear about what their lives have been like.

The set was even realistic to some degree — we got to see Jake's childhood bedroom, two different living rooms and the hospital where Beth stayed at the beginning of the play when she started her recovery.

The only part of this play that seems unreal to me is the interaction between the actors. Don't get me wrong, I liked the play, and would recommend readers see it, but a few — and I do emphasize a few — of the actors didn't interact well in key scenes.

But, hey — it costs $6, it was the first show, and what is college if not a time to learn what works and what doesn't?

Other than a few blemishes in actor interaction, the play overall was good because it was so unlikely but still seemed lifelike.

I would say Sam Shepard (who was in such films as "The Right Stuff" and "The Pelican Brief") wrote the dialogue well. It really makes the play real. But maybe the next time Shepard writes a play, he should take a tip and write more concisely. Parts of the play lagged, and 2 1/2 hours seemed almost unreasonably long.

The play was worth spending the time and money to see it. You never know, maybe you'll learn something.

Kansas native returns to Sunflower State for 'Joseph'

JAMI NELSON
staff reporter

From the bright lights of New York City to the wheat fields of Kansas, one of the actors in "Joseph and the Amazing Technicolor Dreamcoat" returns to his home state this weekend.

▶ 'Joseph' will be performed at 8 p.m. Saturday in McCain Auditorium. Tickets are $26 for the general public, $24 for senior citizens and $13 for students and children.

Bruce Wilson, a native of Kansas, portrays Gad, one of Joseph's 12 brothers, in "Joseph" at 8 p.m. Saturday in McCain Auditorium.

The performance, with music by Andrew Lloyd Webber and lyrics by Tim Rice, follows the adventures of Joseph and his colorful coat in biblical Egypt. The story originates from the book of Genesis in the Bible.

Wilson grew up in Wichita and graduated from Friends University in 1995.

This performance is no new act for Wilson. For his senior project at Friends, Wilson presented "Joseph" and actively participated in the programming, casting, directing, costume design and set construction.

"It was his thing from start to finish," Natalie Wilson, Bruce's mother, said. "The school was very nice. They really worked with him. It became the major musical of the year."

Wilson's production was a hit at Friends, both with theater patrons and the faculty.

"They had three to four sell-out crowds," his mother said. "The professors at Friends University were very impressed with his performance of 'Joseph.'"

After Friends, Wilson moved to New York City, where he attended the American Musical and Dramatic Academy.

At the academy, Wilson focused on polishing his skills of acting, singing and dancing, and better learned "how to get into the business," his mother said.

He graduated from the academy in February and immediately started auditioning for touring productions. One of the shows was "Joseph" with the Troika Organization.

He was hired from his March audition and has been touring the United States with the group ever since.

"They've been absolutely everywhere," his mother said. Tour stops have included Connecticut, Ohio, Tennessee, California and Wisconsin.

"We flew out to Las Vegas to see him out there."

This weekend, the Troika Organization tours to Sioux City, Iowa; Manhattan; Topeka; and Springfield, Mo. With Wilson touring so close to his hometown, he draws his own audience for the local performances.

"The church that we belong to rented a bus and 150 people are making the trip to either Topeka or Manhattan to see Bruce," his mother said. "It's very flattering."

Besides Wilson's fans, families visiting K-State for its annual Family Weekend can also attend the performance.

"We're happy and proud to have something for Family Weekend," David Frain, assistant director of McCain, said.

This production is nearly sold out and only a few tickets are available at the McCain Box Office, Frain said.

"It's a high-energy, fun production that appeals to all ages. It's jam-packed with humor," Kim Jones, McCain Ambassador and senior in elementary education, said. "It's a show you can go to, just sit back and have a wonderful time."

Sensory research benefits campus, community

LAURA POPE
staff reporter

Free food? Not exactly.

The Sensory Analysis Center, on the first floor of Justin Hall, not only tests food but other non-food products.

"We do work for people on campus, government, outside industry, grant and student projects," said Delores Chambers, manager of the Sensory Analysis Center.

The center completes both descriptive and consumer testing, Chambers said. The products tested range from snack foods, meats, dairy products and breakfast foods to health and beauty products.

Since the center began 15 years ago, nearly 10 panelists have been used in the descriptive analysis. These panelists have three to 15 years of experience, Chambers said. Their job is to describe products using their five senses. In descriptive analysis, the goal is to describe a product's aroma, flavor, texture and appearance.

Consumer testing is also done in the center. Using participants from the general population, the center collects information on how consumers like a product and their preferences.

"We use students when they fit the category," Chambers said.

Clients often specify particular criteria for their clients and the research. Some of the criteria could include age and gender.

Volunteers are paid for participating in the studies. Some studies, such as the ones on consumption, allow individuals to participate in more than one project. However, most of the tests are conducted only once per participant.

"The center was originally started to have a mechanism where students could come in and have professional research done with professional panelists for their projects," Chambers said. "This is still true today."

She said the center is an excellent way for students to get hands-on experience in the professional world of sensory analysis. Not only are students given the opportunity to complete research, the center offers employment options for graduate and undergraduate students.

Students are involved with every aspect of the research, Chambers said. Some of students' responsibilities include helping administer testing, preparing food products, clerical work, data entry and washing dishes.

"This is a growing area," Chambers said. "Job opportunities are excellent for students, and the experience helps."

The center completes testing almost every day and is done for some of the most well-known names in the business, Chambers said.

The process of research is year-round, and the center is closed only on traditional holidays.

Joseph is the brainchild of teenage composer Andrew Lloyd Webber, and lyricist Tim Rice. Although the 1968 debut as a 15-minute religious cantata for a prep school concert hardly resembles today's Tony-nominated musical, the early conmmission inspired the duo for a megahit.

The plot follows the biblical tale of Joseph and his jealous brothers, who sell him into slavery out of spite for their father's preference of Joseph, his splendid coat, and his predictive dreams.

Experience one of the Bible's greatest tales of upward nobility.

Alumni center to be built on campus

MATT KREPS
staff writer

The K-State Alumni Association will be building a new alumni center south of Memorial Stadium. The association hopes to have the building completed in five years.

The association has been looking at expansion for the past two years. It commissioned a feasibility study to assess the possibility of building at the stadium location. The results were overwhelmingly positive, and the board voted unanimously to pursue the project, Karen Shafer, association communications director, said.

"The Memorial Stadium site is a prime location on campus. It will be in a highly visible area and will be easily accessible to off-campus and on-campus guests," Amy Button Renz, association president, said.

The new center is in the earliest stages of planning. The Alumni Association plans to interview four architectural firms in coming weeks, Renz said.

After the architect is selected, time and cost estimates will be available.

Unlike many other campus projects, all firms being interviewed include K-State graduates from the College of Architecture, Planning and Design. The association sent letters to all graduates of the college asking for interested parties to submit requests for interviews. They received about 70 responses, Renz said.

Estimates for the building are 45,000 square feet in two or three stories. The new center will include meeting rooms and banquet facilities, as well as more office space, Renz said.

Part of the drive for a new center is space for functions. The current facility and the K-State Student Union are not able to meet the demand for programming space in Manhattan.

Urick explains expansion plans

The expansion of KSU Stadium is one step closer to reality, but the final decision about a privilege fee to pay for part of the expansion will be made by the student body.

A resolution calling for a referendum vote on the stadium expansion was approved by Privilege Fee Committee Sunday. The resolution will be introduced at Thursday's Student Senate meeting. If the measure passes Senate, students will vote their approval or disapproval of assessing a privilege fee for the project in a special November election.

The proposed privilege fee needs 60 percent approval to be brought before Student Senate. Senators will then decide whether to impose the fee.

Athletic Director Max Urick said student fees would fund approximately one-third of the proposed expansion of KSU Stadium, which can hold 38,631 fans in permanent fixed seats. Two plans for expansion would boost the number of permanent seats to 44,611 or 48,653.

UGB president says burger bid likely to fail

TRAVIS D. LENKNER

Happy Meals, value meals and Big Macs may be distant dreams for K-State McDonald's lovers.

The restaurant's proposal to move into the K-State Student Union Food Court when the Union's renovation is complete is likely to fail at tonight's Union Governing Board meeting, UGB President Patrick Carney said.

McDonald's originally submitted the proposal in July 1996. The Union also asked Hardee's and Burger King to submit bids to be the hamburger vendor in the Union Food Court. McDonald's has been the only chain to stay in the game, Carney said.

"Hardee's and Burger King have fallen out, but McDonald's has kept their proposal alive," he said.

The restaurant chain's bid has some sticking points that will keep it out of the Union, Carney said. Unless the company is willing to negotiate, the deal is off.

"The chance of them coming into the Union is less than 50 percent," Carney said.

At issue are several components of the McDonald's plan. First and foremost, the restaurant's ideas for soda vending challenge the Food Court's design and the Union's pocketbook, Carney said.

McDonald's wants to vend its own soft drinks, or at least take all of the revenue from their sale; that's something no other chain in the Stateroom does. Carney said soda-vending revenues in the Union can add up to $200,000 per year — money UGB doesn't want to lose.

"Currently, Amigos and Manchu Wok serve food, but the soda sales still go to the Union. That is not what McDonald's has in this proposal. Under their proposal, they would get all of the revenue from the sale of their sodas. If they aren't willing to negotiate that point, that will be a deal breaker," Carney said.

But according to an Aug. 25 letter to Union Director Bernard Pitts from Kevin Downey, a McDonald's real estate representative, the Union's loss of soda revenue wouldn't be detrimental in the long run, because rent that the Union collects is based on McDonald's sales.

Amigos confronts low profits, may lose Union spot

Amigos, the Mexican food restaurant in the K-State Student Union Stateroom, is in need of its namesakes.

Amigos could use a few hungry friends.

The restaurant, said Union Governing Board President Patrick Carney, is hurting financially.

"They aren't running at the level that they thought they would. They aren't doing very well at all at the moment," Carney said.

Since its installation more than a year ago, Carney said the Mexican restaurant hasn't seen the returns that it expected when it moved into the Stateroom. The search may soon be on for another food chain, he said.

"Amigos isn't nearly as profitable as we hoped that they would be. We might be out looking for another Mexican food-style concept soon. I can tell you now that the front runner would be Taco Bell," Carney said.

The choice of Taco Bell would be as a result of a K-State survey conducted when Union renovations were being planned, Carney said.

"In a poll that was done on this campus, students wanted a chicken concept; a burger concept, namely McDonald's; and a Mexican concept, namely Taco Bell. Students polled said that they wanted ... more of a name-brand concept in the food court," he said.

Carney said UGB members and other Union officials are puzzled about Amigos' apparent failure.

Memorial provides healing for family, friends

It wasn't a time for grieving and sorrow. It was a time for remembrance and celebration.

A memorial service was held at Derby Food Center Sunday night for Susan Hallauer, 20, junior in elementary special education. Hallauer, a native of Holton, Kan., died in a two-car accident Saturday at the intersection of U.S. Highway 75 and Jackson County Road 254.

Reverend Don Fallon, K-State Coordinator of Religious Activities, led the memorial and invited everyone to share memories of Hallauer.

"It's very healing for the family and the student community to hear the love and caring for Susie," Fallon said. "It is helpful to have faculty, staff, students and family here to share their love. It's very unique."

Index cards were passed out to everyone to write down favorite memories of Hallauer. Students, faculty and family then proceeded to share their written thoughts.

Laura Ziegler, junior in family life and community services and Hallauer's roommate last semester, shared some of her thoughts.

"It was really nice for us to be able to get together and share memories," Ziegler said.

Kay Hallauer, Susan Hallauer's mother, then shared a favorite quote of her daughter's that brought a tear to many people's eyes.

"Susie lived by this note she had written in the back of her student planner. It read: When you were born, you cried and the world rejoiced. Live your life in such a way that when you die, the world will cry, and you will rejoice," Kay Hallauer said. "Susie is rejoicing now."

The memorial concluded with everyone standing and joining hands in memory of Susan Hallauer. Fallon asked everyone to paint a mental picture and remember her face one last time.

"We can all remember the hurt, the fun and the good times," Fallon said. "We also remember how comfortable she was with people, and how people were comfortable with her. She had her life together."

Commerce to fight for 75-cent fee

▶ UGB DISAGREES, wants check-cashing price to be 50 cents.

SARA MARTIN

While Commerce Bank is settling into its new home at the K-State Student Union, check-cashing policies remain in limbo.

Beginning Jan. 1998, Commerce Bank will charge students who don't have Wildcat Card accounts to cash checks. Recently, Union Governing Board agreed to a 50-cent fee on checks up to $50, but Commerce plans to battle for more.

"We're still going to discuss that 75 cents again with the governing board at the next meeting to explain more clearly what expenses we have," Commerce Bank President Ted Haggart said. "The final fee is still to be determined."

Haggart said check-cashing costs include everything from staff expenses to system processing to transferring money from bank to bank. Also, staff time and losses due to insufficient funds cost Commerce thousands of dollars.

"There is a lot of time, effort, expense and risk," he said. "With students who don't have an account with us, there is obviously more of a risk because we don't have an account to cash a check against."

In the past, the Union has offered free check cashing to all students, paying for the bills with money in the Union budget from student privilege fees. Last year, costs totaled $39,000, of which a significant portion paid information counter employees who handled and processed checks.

Bernard Pitts, Union director, said the Union did not plan for check-cashing services this year because they knew a financial institution would take over. As a result, fewer staff were needed to operate the information counter.

To give students prior notice and a period of transition to become accustomed to the idea of a check-cashing fee, Commerce decided to wait until January to implement the changes, Haggart said.

"There are a variety of ways students can cash checks or use ATMs," said Haggart. "[Waiting until January], they had time to decide if they wanted to open a Wildcat account to avoid the fee or figure out other alternatives."

When student privilege fees were being used to cover checking costs, many students who never used the check-cashing services were paying for others to use the service. Haggart said Commerce offers a system that eliminates fees for non-users.

"Commerce does not have the option of a flat fee on all students," Haggart said. "We believe that the simple user fee is a fair way to provide check-cashing service, and those who choose to cash checks will pay a fee to cover the cost."

Students might get opportunity to vote on grading system changes

JENNI EVANS

Students might be voting on Nov. 11 on whether they want to change the traditional grading system that K-State uses.

The plebiscite vote will offer two alternatives to the traditional system. A plus-grading system and a plus/minus grading system will be included on the ballot.

▶ Stadium expansion?
See the story at the top of the page for more info about possible stadium expansion.

The Academic Affairs Committee met Sunday to discuss the possibility of adding this question to the referendum vote on the proposed expansion of KSU stadium.

The committee would like to add the grading-system question to the ballot to increase voter turn-out as well as decrease the cost of having a separate ballot printed.

"If nothing else, it will bring out a more diverse group of people," Nicole Johnson, committee member, said.

Wording of the proposal was also reviewed by committee members and student body vice president Jennafer Neufeld to ensure the issue was clearly defined.

"Some schools have an A-plus option for only the top individual in the class. That might be a neat option," she said.

There was also discussion on the subject of a textbook drive. The committee would like to see used textbooks that are not bought back by the K-State Student Union Bookstore and Varney's Book Store to be sent to underprivileged countries.

"There may be certain countries that would want these books but just can't afford to buy them," Rhett Trujillo, committee chair, said.

Committee members were updated on advancements of the honor code, a proposal that would require students to pledge that they will not cheat. What constitutes cheating and the possibility of plea bargaining were discussed at previous honor

Newton couple indicted in case of Wichita prostitution business

WICHITA — A Newton, Kan., couple is accused of using their escort services as a prostitution business.

Terry L. Herl, 41, and Barbara Herl, 37, were indicted Wednesday on 28 counts of using the telephone and U.S. Postal Service to promote unlawful business activities and 18 counts of money laundering the proceeds. The indictment was announced Friday by U.S. Attorney Jackie Williams.

The two, who are married, began operating the New Elite Dating Service in 1989 out of Wichita. In 1990 or 1991, the defendants opened a second escort service, Select Dating Service, in Wichita.

The purpose of the escort services was to provide dates to customers who paid with cash, personal checks or by credit card. According to the indictment, the escorts routinely engaged in sexual contact with the customers.

The customers would come to the escort service, chose a date, then pay the manager or the escort, according to the U.S. attorney's office. The Herls allegedly received more than $1.4 million between 1992 and 1994 from the escort services.

They face a maximum of 25 years in prison.

Man claims city owes him gold from grandfather's 1882 bond

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — Bill Hester says the city of Knoxville owes him big — $1.8 billion in gold, to be exact.

Hester, a computer consultant for legal firms, said he inherited from his grandfather a $1,000 municipal bond issued in 1882 by the Knoxville Water Works. Interest on the bond was to be paid in gold, and the city made only one interest payment — in 1910, he said.

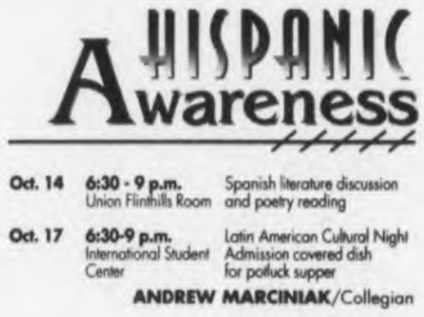
Hester said the bond is now worth about $1.8 billion if paid in gold, or $1 million in cash.

Hester contacted Knoxville 10 years ago about the bond. The city has refused to pay, and Hester has hired a Nashville law firm.

"My attorneys will be asking for the payment in gold," Hester said. "The city of Memphis lost a case on one of these (bearer bonds), and the same law firm in that case has joined my law firm."

Knoxville officials said a punched hole with a date on the bond proves it was paid, but Hester said historical records show that on bonds of that age, each time an interest payment was made on the bond, a hole was punched with the date.

He said the one punch on the bond does not mean it was paid off, but rather that one interest payment was made.



Jury says hospital must pay man $1.25 million for missing sperm

PORTLAND, Ore. — A jury decided a cancer survivor's sperm was irreplaceable and ordered a hospital to pay him $1.25 million for losing his deposit to its sperm bank.

Robert Eubanks Jr. was a 25-year-old medical student when he was diagnosed in 1985 with Hodgkin's disease, a cancer of the lymph nodes. His doctor suggested he should deposit his sperm because chemotherapy could leave him sterile.

Eubanks — sterile after months of chemotherapy — returned to the lab at Legacy Emanuel Hospital in 1994, having beaten the disease and ready to start a family. But the hospital's sperm bank told him they did not have his sperm.

A hospital spokeswoman wouldn't comment. Attorneys for the hospital argued in court that Eubanks simply went to the lab to have his sperm tested and did not leave deposits.

HELEN MUELLER, grandmother of John Mueller, fifth-year senior in electrical engineering, is presented with K-State's 1997 Chimes Honorary Family award.

Mueller selected as K-State's Honorary Family

KERRY BOYDSTON
staff reporter

The thought of nominating his grandparents, Emil and Helen Mueller, for K-State's 1997 Chimes Honorary Family never really crossed John Mueller's mind.

"I didn't think about it until this year, and I thought for some reason I've got to do that," Mueller, fifth-year senior in electrical engineering, said.

"So I wrote an essay, but I didn't tell anyone I had written it until I found out I had won."

Mueller said when he told his grandmother about being selected as the honorary family, she didn't know exactly how to react.

"I didn't let her know for a while because she was on vacation. But I finally called her when she was vacationing in Missouri and dropped it on her," he said.

"She never would have expected anything like this. This award is a lot different than anything she could have imagined."

Each year, Chimes Junior Honorary sponsors an essay contest and selects one family to be featured as the K-State honorary family. The Muellers were honored at a brunch before Saturday's football game and presented a plaque at halftime.

"We had a committee that sat down and read through all of the applications, and when we read the Mueller essay, I just knew that had to be the one selected," Danelle Hanschu, chair of the selection committee, said.

"In years past, the winners have been selected based upon what they have given K-State. But this year, we decided to look more at family values and the real meaning of what a family should be," Hanschu said. "John's essay exemplified this."

Mueller wrote his essay based on the support his grandparents had given him and his brother Ben, sophomore in engineering, throughout their lives.

The Muellers had already raised their four children and made plans for retirement when, in 1986, they became parents again. Their grandsons' parents, Dave and Judy Mueller, were killed in an accident involving a drunken driver.

"I can't imagine being at retirement and suddenly taking into your home an 11-year-old and an 8-year-old," Mueller said. "They gave up their retirement to take care of us, and this was an enormous sacrifice."

Mueller felt this award should go to both his grandmother and also in memory of his grandfather, who passed away three years ago.

"My grandparents gave us unwavering love and support that made all the difference in the world. They gave me, and my grandmother continues to give me, something which I can never pay back — a home and a loving family."

State runs out of money for transportation projects

MATT KREPS
staff writer

Kansas is out of money for transportation construction until Congress can pass new legislation. Three different bills are being considered, but none are likely to pass before the legislation expires Oct. 23.

The legislation, the Intermodal Surface Transportation Efficiency Act of 1991 — commonly referred to as ISTEA — provided Kansas with federal money for transportation projects including roads, buses and education.

Congress approved an emergency extension keeping the old legislation alive until Oct. 23, but no new funding was included in the extension.

Under the extension, states can use any remaining funding from last year's budget to continue transportation projects. In Kansas, a little more than $12 million is available, compared to a yearly budget of more than $200 million.

In the meantime, Kansas transportation agencies approved as many projects as possible before Sept. 30 to keep the state going until January, said Dennis Slimmer for the Kansas Department of Transportation.

"We will pay on projects that we have approved. We won't be authorizing any new projects," said Dave Geiger, Director of the Federal Highway Administration's Kansas Division.

The three different bills under consideration have different origins. One came from the House of Representatives, another from the Senate and the third from a special committee. All three bills continue to provide federal money from transportation taxes for construction and service projects, but in different amounts.

Under any of the bills, Kansas should keep at least the same level of funding, Geiger said. Kansas usually gets about the same amount back as it puts in through taxes. The Senate bill improves Kansas' share of the money by .15 percent. However, balanced budget requirements are holding up the bills in Congress.

Another problem is legislators still have to agree on funding for each state. This will probably spur a debate, Slimmer said.

"That's probably the most contentious issue debated in Congress — that is who gets what and how much," Slimmer said.

For the most part, the big cities will be hit the hardest because they use the money faster during the fiscal year. Smaller towns generally have more funds left over, Slimmer said.

Officials from KDOT are staying in close communication with legislators about the issue.

Provost freezes hiring to improve equipment

MATT KREPS
staff writer

K-State will not be hiring more unclassified staff for the next two years.

Provost James Coffman issued a letter Thursday calling for all departments to stop hiring new faculty. The move is an effort to redirect funds into upgrades for teaching and research needs.

"The idea is just to delay, in effect, the hiring process and use the money that's freed up by that to fix our equipment before the enrollment increase," he said.

The letter indicated K-State's student population would be stable for the next two years before beginning a steady increase over a five- to seven-year period.

The student body has declined in numbers for several years and is at a temporary low. The current faculty is adequate to meet present teaching needs, according to the letter.

If departments experience a need for faculty during the freeze, some exceptions can be made. However, according to the letter, it would require approval from the Provost's Office.

By redirecting funds from salaries, the university will be able to purchase new equipment for research and educational uses, Coffman said. Scientific research and teaching labs will see the largest improvements.

The money saved in each department will revert to the individual colleges for spending by the deans. If the Kansas legislature approves a proposed two-to-one matching of equipment fee dollars, more improvements could be made.

The proposed matching funds would allow the equipment to be maintained after the two-year freeze is lifted and even allow for continued improvement, Coffman said.

Clinton criticizes pop culture for increase in illegal drug use

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Heralding a new $195 million anti-drug ad campaign, President Clinton blamed pop culture for glamorizing illegal drug use and said government must step in to "reach our children with the right message before it's too late."

In his weekly radio broadcast Saturday, the president said drug use has nearly tripled among eighth graders while the number of anti-drug public service ads has fallen by more than a third.

"Movies, music videos and magazines have filled the gap ... too often with warped images of a dream world where drugs are cool," Clinton said.

Noting that young people who have not used drugs by age 21 will probably never use them, he added, "That's why we must reach our children with the right message before it's too late."

Since last year's release of statistics showing that drug use by young people had doubled, Republicans have accused Clinton of ignoring America's drug problem. GOP presidential challenger Bob Dole made the issue a centerpiece of his campaign against Clinton.

On Friday, the president signed a spending bill that contains $195 million for what he called "an unprecedented, high-profile, prime-time media campaign to reach every child in America between the ages of 9 and 17 at least four times a week."

The message will be straightforward, he said: "Drugs are wrong, drugs are illegal, and drugs can kill you."

He urged leaders across America to match the funds to expand the program. And to the entertainment industry, he urged: "Never glorify drugs. But more important, tell our children the truth. Show them that drug use is really a death sentence."

The admonition echoed remarks Clinton made five months ago, when he rebuked the fashion industry for its use of "heroin-chic" photographs featuring models seemingly strung out on heroin. In his radio address Saturday, the president did not identify examples of the movies, videos or magazines that he accused of glamorizing drugs.

Customers should understand options before banking on accounts

Seventy-five cents probably won't buy a whole lot — maybe a pack of gum or a piece of fruit from the Union Stateroom. But at least when you spend it, you have something tangible in your hand from the exchange.

If you have a Wildcat Card account or a Commerce Bank student account, you are charged that same 75 cents to make a withdrawal from a Commerce automated teller machine. And your little hand is no richer for having spent the three quarters.

A dollar seventy-five can get you a little more. A fan loaf and a pop refill can be purchased for about that amount.

Use that Commerce student account ATM card in another bank's ATM, your fan-loaf-and-refill money is gone. After Commerce charges you $1.75 for using the foreign ATM, you still have to contend with whatever charges the originating bank might throw your way.

That could've been lunch.

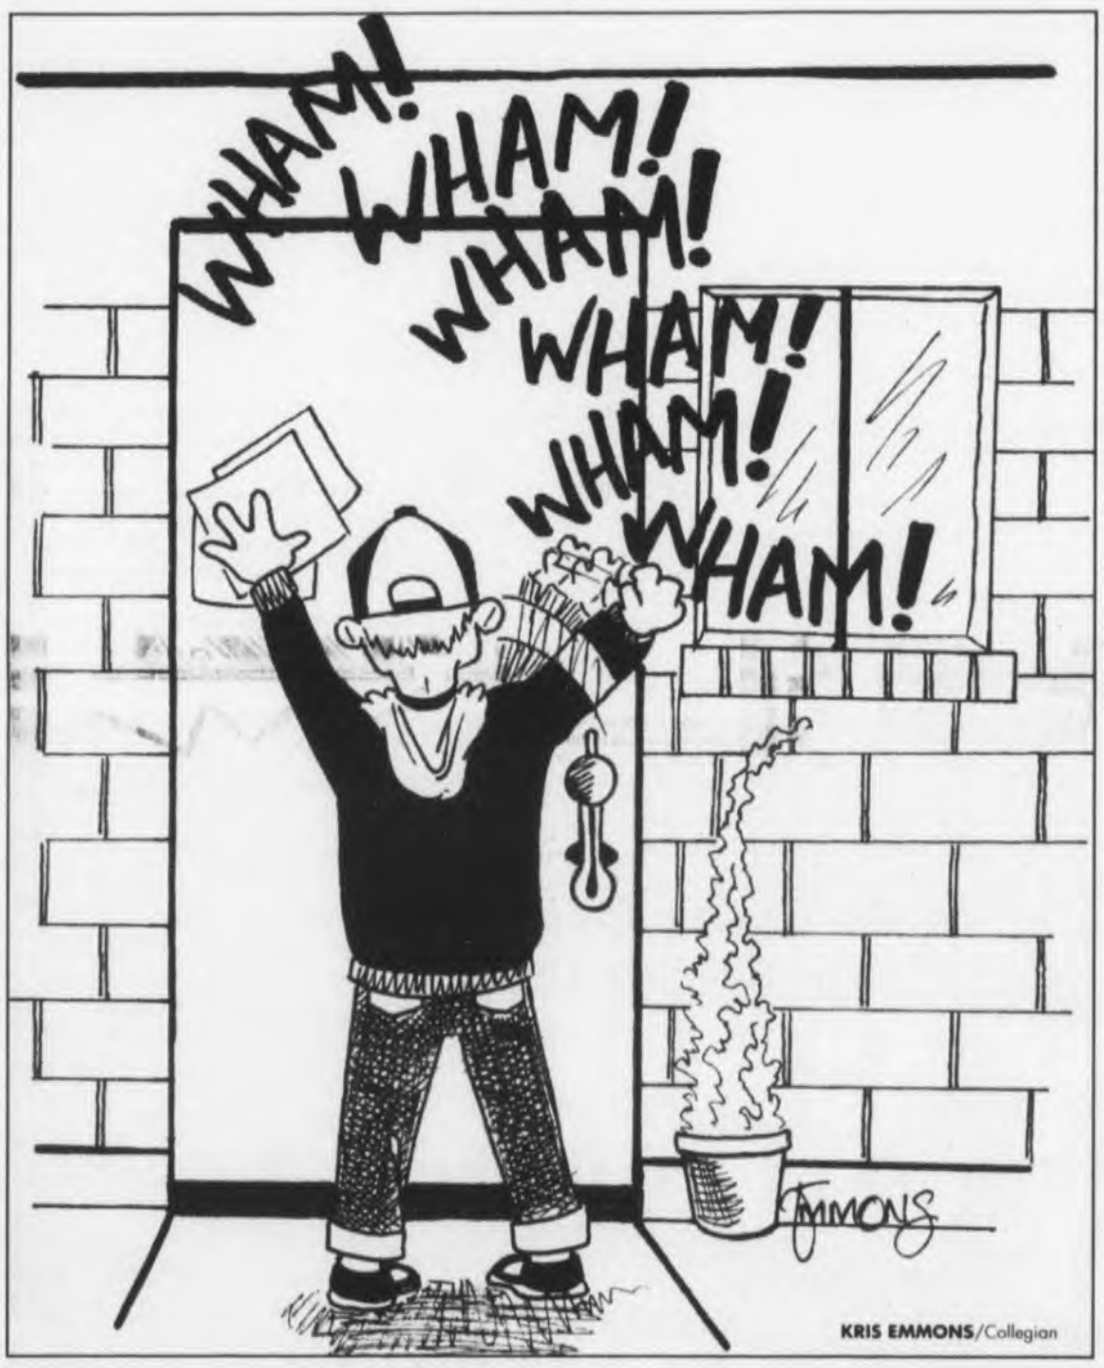
Now Commerce is looking to charge students who don't have Wildcat Card accounts 75 cents for check cashing, beginning January 1998.

Little fees here and there, for Commerce bank users or not, can add up quickly. And nobody knows more than college students that every cent counts.

Many banks in Manhattan don't charge their customers to use the bank's ATM, nor do they charge them for check cashing. Commerce also offers a plan, different from the student plan, with free ATM withdrawals.

Sure, Commerce is nestled conveniently in the K-State Student Union, but that convenience has a lofty price tag. Before settling down with a particular bank or a particular plan in that bank, be sure you understand all the implications involved. Just because Commerce has metaphorically built hotels on Mediterranean and Baltic avenues, that doesn't mean you have to land on them all the time.

Before you cash that check or slip that card into a Commerce ATM, be sure to pause and think about the money that might magically disappear from your account.



And then no fan loaves for you.

It's that time when children push everything to raise money, but will you refuse to USE YOUR KIDS?

KRIS EMMONS/Collegian

I refuse to pimp out my children.

It's that time of year — children pushing magazines, cookie dough and Christmas cards to raise money for school. Last week, my boys brought home the dreaded magazine sales packet from their elementary school.

My disdain for the use of children to raise funds for education goes way back to my childhood. I am the oldest of four children. My stepfather was a carpenter, and my mother, for most of my childhood, was a domestic engineer (housewife). We were government-cheese poor. All of our friends were poor. We lived in a poor neighborhood. Nobody I knew had the money to buy the good toilet paper, much less subscribe to Time magazine, dish out $9 for a bucket of cookie dough or pay for personalized holiday greetings.

I hated the days at school when the teacher would ask us how much we had sold. There was always that one kid whose mom worked in some big corporation and sold a thousand doohickeys. I was the timid kid in the back row who lied and said I had sold three doohickeys.

As if being poor wasn't embarrassing enough — standing in the free lunch line, being the only one who didn't buy a yearbook, wearing last year's fashions and thrift store shoes. But at least twice a year, out loud, in front of my peers, I had to announce my family was poor.

Things have gotten better. The schools are trying harder to disguise economic inequity among children. There aren't free lunch lines — every child has a lunch ticket regardless of whether they paid for it.

For some reason the magazine sales and events like it persist.

We all know schools need money. My favorite bumper sticker poses the question, what would the world be like if the schools had all the money they need and the Air Force had to have a bake sale to buy a bomber?

I just don't think selling magazines is the way. First, it can be dangerous. A few weeks ago an 11-year-old boy was killed while selling something door to door as a fund raiser for his school. Granted, the juvenile who allegedly committed the crime was probably a sick individual, and it is in no way the school's fault. But the tragedy raises some eyebrows.

Many schools say they discourage children from selling door to door, but these same schools offer prizes and awards to the students and classes who sell the most.

The packet my children brought home said, "We aren't encouraging doorbell-ringing and door-to-door sales." On the front side of the same letter it said, "There will be some small participation awards for students who bring in orders." It also said every student who returns the packet with or without an order will receive a sticker. Sounds good so far.

But then you turn the page over.

Clearly laid out with stars, italics and bold letters is the "Northview Family Reading Program Sales Promotion." Doesn't that sound like a good thing? All families should read. Who do they think they are kidding? This isn't about reading as a family — it is about getting money by overpaying for magazine subscriptions.

"Every order a student turns in, gets them one Draw from the Spinner Top Box! If they get a 'Specially Marked Spinner,' they will get their choice of several small awards. Some of these prizes include: sunglasses, stuffed Animals, candy and other items. The students will get to keep the Spinner they draw," the letter said. In this paragraph, the prizes were printed in bold letters. The letter also lists other special prizes kids earn if they sell specific magazines.

If the parents who push magazines and other stuff spent that much time and energy lobbying their government officials for more school funding, we'd have new books and computers for every student.

Northview PTA/PTO raised $1,800 dollars last year through magazine sales. There are 437 students. Even if only half the parents wrote a check for $10, the PTA/PTO would have more money than they got from magazine sales. That allows for half the families to be poor and for those families that have more than one children.

Sign me up — here's my check.

Opinion page preaches too much

I am writing to voice my total disagreement with Karl Allen, whose column in Friday's Collegian called for no separation of church and state. When will the evangelism/preaching for Christianity and other religions in your pages ever stop?

Religious zealots like Allen, Kevin Bailey, Majed Khan and others including the Promise Keepers (the Dave Ball letter in the same issue) should not be allowed to use the Collegian's editorial page to preach to readers on a regular basis about their noninclusive and narrow-minded religious philosophies.

When Allen and other Christians insinuate that they are persecuted like gays, atheists and minorities, their actions show a lack of understanding of the past and present.

I can only pray that someday you will realize the ungodliness of their ways by paraphrasing the words of the Rev. C. Horner Redwine found in Kurt Vonnegut's 1959 novel "The Sirens of Titan":

"O Lord Most High, Creator of the Cosmos, Spinner of Galaxies, Soul of Electromagnetic Waves, Inhaler and Exhaler of Inconceivable Volumes of Vacuum, Spitter of Fire and Rock, Triffler with Millennia — what could we do for Thee that Thou couldst not do for Thyself one octillion times better? Nothing. What could we do or say that could possibly interest Thee? Nothing. Oh, Mankind, rejoice in the Apathy of our Creator, for It makes us free and truthful and dignified at last.

"No longer can fools point to a ridiculous accident of good luck and say 'Somebody up there likes me.' And no longer can a tyrant say 'God wants this or that to happen, and anybody who does not help this or that is against God.' O Lord Most High, what a glorious Weapon is Thy Apathy, for we have unsheathed It, have thrust and slashed mightily with It, and the Claptrap that has so often enslaved us or driven us into the madhouse lies slain."

And, O Lord, deliver us from Allen, Bailey, Khan, Ball and other Collegian preachers forever and ever. Amen.

I quietly watch the two women in front of me go about their business. One woman has her back to me, sitting at her desk, busily shuffling papers. The other woman, Suzy Auten, is hurrying about, taking notes, making memos, running to and from file cabinets and desks and down the hallway that makes up the right-hand corner of the office.

This seems like a far cry from Eisenhower Hall, which is odd, because Eisenhower is really only a few hundred feet away.

The phone rings. Auten grabs it with a flourish.

"Hello? Yes, her meeting will be at the metropolitan college of Boston University ..."

To the right stands a large file cabinet adorned at the top with numerous multicolored folders. One of them is labeled: "Instructional Equipment Needs." In front of me are three desks aligned to provide workspace for the two receptionists. Decoration of the desks is sparse, sticking to a few pictures and little else, with large plastic sheets covering the bulk of the floor to allow rolling chairs to glide smoothly in the great dance of office furniture.

Auten resumes flipping through papers as she talks on the phone. "Call you back, then. Thanks, bye," she said as she sets the phone down. "God, such a pain ... ," she said to no one in particular. Then she turns to look at me, smiles and said, "I'll be right with you," and she's off again.

A painting hangs above my head, depicting a landscape which is unmistakably American — a large desert rock formation, possibly Sedona, Ariz., possibly a New Mexico mesa. The name on the bottom, scribbled in blue, is S. Birger Sanzén. This painting is probably worth about $40,000.

The reason I was sitting in the Office of the Provost was because of something I remembered Judith Zivanovic, associate dean of the College of Arts and Sciences and director of the Arts and Sciences Honors Program, said to me.

"We have a tremendous infrastructure here that a lot of people don't know about until they get involved. We have faculty that are willing to spend all kinds of time helping students."

Hmm ... that made me recall what Beth Powers, scholarship adviser, had said to me, too. It seemed to fall along the same lines.

"It seems so darn self-perpetuating to me ... people on this campus are so supportive of what I do down through administration, faculty, staff and students."

We know there is something special about K-State. Could it be the degree of cooperation between the different branches of university life that create such a special environment?

Consider — in the U.S. News and World Report's 1997 Best Colleges Guide, an article on successful honors programs touted the benefits of access to professors. The article centered around the University of Georgia.

"Last spring," the author of the article wrote, "Georgia celebrated the awarding of a Rhodes Scholarship to Rob Sutherland, a senior in the honors program. The program now conducts faculty-led information sessions to encourage students to start considering applying for such awards as early as their sophomore year. Individual attention and advice like that are rare at any school."

I didn't know that, and I'm the newspaper guy. I'm paid to know that kind of stuff. I'll bet you didn't know that the environment we have is rare, either. At K-State, good relations are the rule — not the exception. This is the bottom line: K-State is one of the most incomparable schools in the country.

The faculty here are more open than anywhere else. Students play a big role in the administration of the school. It's the foremost training ground for leadership. Faculty are concerned that students succeed. It's William Richter, assistant provost for International Programs, who's concerned that all students should be involved in an international program.

The undergraduate research opportunities are limitless. It's my calculus teacher, Dave, asking for questions in a lecture of 500 students. It's meeting my teachers in Hale Library while we both search for books. It's going over to Michael Donnelly's house, an associate professor of English, to watch movies as part of the Honors Program. It's my physics professor buying me coffee as I stay late to finish a project.

You can't find it anywhere else. It's due to too many different influences.

That's why I wanted to talk to Provost James Coffman to pinpoint some of the causes of this special environment. Instead, I find Coffman is in Russia, specifically Voronezh (Ver-o-nage), a small city-state of several million people whose higher education system K-State is helping restructure. So, when she gets around to it, Suzy Auten sums up in Coffman's absence.

"We have a reputation for having those kinds of people," Auten said, as she stops moving momentarily. "People who listen ... people want to be treated well."

In the end, even though we have all this going for us, you won't find K-State in Newsweek magazine. Even though you can't drive through Johnson County without seeing a Wildcat license plate every block, you won't read about us in the Kansas City Star. Even with all our scholars, we still aren't in the Fiske Guide to Colleges.

It's not about offices, it's not about cold days. Were going to teach others not to overestimate their chances.

I always did like being the underdog.

Think purple.

Native American club to regroup

BYRON VOGEL
staff reporter

In an effort to bolster its campus presence, the Native American Student Body will hold a reorganizational meeting this afternoon. The gathering, which will take place at 4 p.m. in Anderson 224, will mark the first time NASB has met this semester.

Tamara Goodson, junior in graphic design and president of NASB, said the meeting is aimed primarily at recruitment. However, tonight's meeting will be crucial in determining whether there is sufficient interest in keeping NASB afloat at K-State.

"Including students, staff and faculty, there are about 150 Native Americans at K-State," Goodson said. "Last year, though, there were only four or five people running the group."

Goodson, who served as vice president of the Native American Student Association at Oklahoma State University last year, said her switch to K-State was a difficult adjustment.

"We had a very active organization at OSU, and I was surprised to see so few Native Americans in school at KSU," she said. "I realize now that it was a real culture change for me. At OSU, you couldn't walk around a corner without seeing an Indian, but when you look around here, you really don't see that many."

Goodson said she has realistic expectations for NASB, given the small Native American population at K-State.

"There are Native American people who maybe weren't raised in that culture, and this will be a good way to expose them to that more," she said.

However, she said, it is still important that Native American students have a place to come together, as well as an official forum for their concerns.

"There are all sorts of groups on campus with all sorts of things going on," Goodson said. "I want to have a group that promotes awareness of the Native American culture, education for Native Americans and encourage people to get involved more in their culture."

Historic costume collection might face ax because of overcrowding

LESLIE NACHTRAB
staff reporter

Behind the door of Justin 337 resides a museum of more than 15,000 clothing and textile artifacts stored to preserve their history.

However, the Historic Costumes and Textiles Collection, which is maintained by the Department of Clothing, Textiles and Interior Design, has an uncertain future. The department is reviewing its collection because of overcrowding and maintenance problems.

Mitchell Strauss, department head, said the problem could be likened to the academic-journal subscription cuts Hale Library is facing.

"The costume collection, among lots of issues around the university, is being reviewed in terms of what is required to maintain it properly or whether it should be maintained at all," Strauss said.

The collection is a repository of clothing, hats, textiles, dolls, accessories, patterns, period magazines, photographs and tools associated with the creation of clothing. The oldest artifact in the collection is an authentic child's corset dating back to 1740.

The collection was started about 150 years ago, Strauss said, as Kansas residents began sending clothes and textiles they found from cleaning out old attics and upon the death of relatives. He said faculty members have also added international examples after traveling around the world.

The collection does not have a curator, but Marla Day, graduate student in clothing and textiles, is helping take care of it.

"The collection is really neat," Day said. "Everything is here. If a student in the department wants to come in here and research a specific style of clothing or textile, it's probably in here."

Proper care and preservation of the artifacts includes keeping the room cool and dimly lighted and keeping the artifacts covered by acid-free, non-colored paper in drawers and closets. Throughout the years, the collection has grown so much that storage has overflowed to keeping the artifacts on racks in the room.

"The space is so crowded that we couldn't add anything else in a responsible manner if we wanted to," Strauss said. "There is potential there to already be damaging things."

The department brought in a consultant to go through the collection and offer suggestions of what should be done.

"She reviewed over our mission statement," Strauss said. "It was her judgment that our mission statement is written so broadly that in the course of this collection's history, we took in anything that was interesting."

Strauss said he believed the collection should be edited to focus on a specialty area.

"Good collections are focused collections," he said. "All collections probably have some general stuff, but the exceptional collections have niches.

"While we have some very nice things up there of great story value, there's also a lot of other things up there that, while they are of interest to the layperson, they don't really have any historical interest because there's probably lots of it all over the place."

Strauss said he thought the department should consider making the collection focus on ethnic and international artifacts.

"The faculty vary in their view," Strauss said. "Some faculty think it is an incredibly precious resource. Some faculty question its value. And that's why we're going through a process to try to work through the rational and emotional questions and trying to resolve what the most responsible, best path forward is."

Strauss said they already have a large ethnic collection composed of both tourist renditions and authentic artifacts. He said the department would need to decide which way they wanted to go with the collection.

"The future of the costume collection resides in the hands of the faculty," Strauss said. "There will be a very democratic process, a very thoughtful process to decide with the help of a consultant, but the faculty will ultimately decide."

PENN STATE NEW NO. 1

Top-ranked Florida's 28-21 loss to No. 14 Louisianna State University on Saturday night cleared the way for No. 2 Penn State to regain the top spot in college football.

Earlier in the day, the Nittany Lions beat No. 7 Ohio State, 31-27.

Penn State started the season No. 1, but fell to No. 2 on Sept. 21 after Florida beat then-No. 4 Tennessee. But the Gators' stunning loss to LSU vaulted the Lions back to No. 1.

Cedric Donaldson returned an interception 31 yards for a touchdown, and Herb Tyler scored on an 11-yard run during a 93-second span in the fourth quarter as LSU shocked Florida in Baton Rouge, La.

The Tigers (5-1, 3-1 SEC) beat defending national champion Florida (5-1, 3-1) for the first time since 1987 and avenged last year's embarrassing 56-13 loss to the Gators.

The Tigers snapped the Gators' two long Southeastern Conference winning streaks — 25 games overall and 19 straight on the road.

When the game ended, fans in the capacity crowd of 80,677 stormed the field and tore down both goal posts to celebrate the Tigers' first victory over a top-ranked team.

At State College, Pa., Curtis Enis rushed for 211 yards and a fourth-quarter touchdown as Penn State (5-0, 2-0 Big Ten) avenged last year's 38-7 loss at Ohio State (5-1, 1-1).

Playing in front of a record crowd of 97,282 at Beaver Stadium, Penn State fell behind 27-17 late in the third quarter before the running tandem of Enis and Aaron Harris sparked the rally.

Harris' 51-yard touchdown run with 20 seconds left in the third quarter cut Ohio State's lead to 27-24. Enis put Penn State ahead with a 26-yard TD run with 10:31 remaining in the game.

BIG 12 WEEKEND

Oklahoma State pulled out a last-minute, 33-29 victory over Colorado on Saturday to reach a high point they had not seen in more than half a century.

"I've been associated with a lot of big victories, but this is one of the biggest of my career," said Cowboys' coach Bob Simmons.

Big victories mean big losses for the other sideline.

"We are as low as we have been in this program since I arrived here in 1994," Colorado coach Rick Neuheisel said.

Oklahoma State is 6-0 for the first time since 1945, and now stands 3-0 in the Big 12.

The Cowboys gave up 390 yards and were penalized 12 times, but Maurice Simpson's interception of John Hessler's overthrown pass led to a 19-yard touchdown pass from Tony Lindsay to Alonzo Mayes with 1:56 to play for the winning score.

Colorado (2-3, 0-2) dropped out of the poll after a run of 143 straight weeks.

"We played above adversity, which is a strong symbol that you have a good football team," Simmons said. "These kids found a way, hung in there and won."

The result was predictable as Nebraska (5-0, 2-0) cruised past Baylor (1-4, 0-2) in Waco, 49-21.

Ahman Green scored on runs of 3, 58, 2 and 30 yards and finished with 158 yards rushing. He has 11 TD's for the season to go with 692 yards rushing

Texas A&M (5-0, 2-0) hardly had the ball against Iowa State (0-6, 0-3) in College Station but knew what to do with it.

Sirr Parker had an 80-yard touchdown run and a 78-yard kickoff return for the Aggies, who scored three times in the first quarter.

"The players did a good job of coming out fast and really staying on top of Iowa State throughout the game," A&M coach R.C. Slocum said.

A&M led 42-10 at the half after scoring three more touchdowns in the second quarter.

In Lubbock, the only score for Kansas was by the defense. The Jayhawks ran for just 11 yards. The lack of a running game put too much pressure on Zac Wegner, who was starting in place of the injured Matt Johner.

"Our quarterback did OK, but he cannot throw from his back," Kansas coach Terry Allen said.

Tech (3-2, 2-0) lost quarterback Zebbie Lethridge and wide receiver Donnie Hart to injury.

John Mackovic stayed in the background, and Ricky Williams came to the forefront. Because of the outcome, the Texas Longhorns might have salvaged a season.

Williams carried the offensive load with 223 yards on a school-record 40 carries and had two 1-yard touchdown runs as the Longhorns held on to edge Oklahoma 27-24, giving the embattled Longhorns and their coach new hope in the Big 12 race.

"If we hadn't won this one, I think our season would have been pretty much ruined," Williams said. "We said before the game that we were going to put the past behind us," Texas quarterback James Brown said. "We need to carry this win with us the rest of the season."

K-State tallies 339 yards on ground to run over Missouri 41-11

SUN DEE MILLS

Missouri quarterback Corby Jones and the Missouri Tigers pleaded no contest to the Wildcats in Saturday's first Big 12 home game, falling 41-11 before 43,510 purple-clad fans.

The Cat secondary allowed Jones, the Tigers' leading rusher, to pass for 106 yards. On the ground, however, Jones' 23 rushing attempts only netted a team-high 84 yards.

"The defense played well enough, but we did have some difficulties with Corby on the option," Coach Bill Snyder said. "We struggled a little bit with the passing game, much like the Ohio game."

The Cats offense shined on the cloudy day, with junior quarterback Michael Bishop in a starring role as the Cats' leading rusher. Bishop set a Big 12 quarterback rushing record with 196 yards, a bulk of that yardage coming in the first half. Jones held the previous record with 193 yards.

Bishop was so impressive that immediately after the game, he was cornered by a TV crew for a postgame interview. Upon seeing this, Snyder ushered Bishop away from the interview and the TV crew. Bishop never appeared again before the media.

In the postgame press conference, Snyder said he was not angry with Bishop, just giving him a media break.

"No, he hasn't done anything to upset me. He played too well to upset me today," Snyder said. "Michael has received the glut of media attention, which probably in some cases is deserved, but there is a football team that assists him tremendously."

That team was impressed with Bishop, too.

"He is awesome," junior wide receiver Darnell McDonald said. McDonald was on the receiving end of one of Bishop's three completions, but McDonald's catch was the only touchdown pass.

"He is what any team needs," McDonald said. "He can scramble out of the pocket, but he can also make the proper reads of the receivers."

The Cats put the first points on the board with 5:22 to go in the first quarter on a 14-play drive. Senior running back Eric Hickson dove into the end zone for the 2-yard touchdown.

Senior kicker Martin Gramatica moved up to fifth on the all-time scoring list with the successful extra-point attempt.

BISHOP BECOMES KING

Quarterback Michael Bishop has career day against Tigers

Somewhere in the crowd of 43,510 at KSU Stadium on Saturday was a young boy watching his first football game.

And pity his parents, who must have felt stupid trying to teach him about the sport during K-State's 41-11 victory over Missouri.

"That's the quarterback. He throws the ball," Dad said.

No, not today, Pops. K-State quarterback Michael Bishop took control of the ball on 23 of the Wildcats' 60 plays, rushing 14 times and passing only nine.

When he passed, he looked like he maybe should have run the ball instead, completing only three of nine attempts.

However, when he ran, he looked more like a running back than any quarterback in the 102-year history of K-State football. Bishop gained 196 yards on the ground, establishing a new school record. He eclipsed the mark set by Darrell Ray Dickey against South Dakota in 1981.

In fact, only four times in school history has a running back gained more yards in a single game. And Bishop didn't even have any carries in the fourth quarter, even though he was on pace to gain 261 yards, nine more than Mike Lawrence's school record of 252 set last season against Iowa State.

"He beat us single-handedly," Missouri noseguard Jeff Marriott said. "I thought we could shut him down."

According to the statistics, Marriott thought wrong. Bishop gained more than a first down per run, averaging 14 yards a run, including carries for 24, 38 and 42 yards.

He also ran for two touchdowns and would have had a third if he hadn't been caught from behind at Missouri's 1-yard line after taking the snap at the Tigers' 39.

"You find yourself watching him once he gets past the line of scrim-

K-STATE QUARTERBACK Michael Bishop tries to break through a Missouri tackle Saturday at KSU Stadium. Bishop ran for 196 yards on 14 carries and set a new K-State rushing record for quarterbacks. He also set a Big 12 Conference record for number of yards rushing in a single game by a quarterback.

scrimmage because you know he could go anywhere," K-State offensive guard Jeremy Martin said. "Now we know he will do that sort of thing, so we've been working to improve that."

One problem the line has is adjusting to Bishop's improvising. He runs several draws each game, but not all of them are signaled in as draws. Some of his carries Saturday came on pass plays.

Bishop admits he's a "make-something-out-of-nothing" type of scrambling quarterback, and when he decides to run, the linemen have to be able to make the transition from pass blocking to run blocking.

"More than once, I was pass blocking, and all of a sudden, I see this blur fly by me," K-State center Kendyl Jacox said.

Jacox wouldn't say how many times he had to make that switch during Bishop's 14 carries, but he did say that the majority of the carries were called as running plays.

Still, Bishop showed he has the athletic ability to make up for any shortcomings he creates for the linemen with his mobile style, as he broke tackle after tackle and bounced off hit after hit.

Martin said it can be difficult to block for Bishop, because he has to sustain his blocks longer.

However, he said he still enjoys blocking for him, because even if he misses an assignment and gets Bishop into trouble quickly, Bishop has the skills to get out of trouble.

Martin said he missed an assignment on a block during a second-quarter play and his man was quickly in the backfield, pressuring Bishop.

"Then I looked up, and he's running 45 yards downfield," Martin said.

forced the second of eight punts. K-State was flagged for roughing the kicker, a call Snyder disagreed with. After requesting to talk to the official, K-State was charged with a timeout.

"My view of it was that we blocked the kick," Snyder said. Nevertheless, for the second time in two games, the Cats gave up a first down for the same penalty.

On that gift from the Cats, the Tigers managed a 19-yard field goal, which remained their only score until late in the fourth quarter.

Meanwhile, the Cats' offense racked up the points. Bishop ran seven yards for the second touchdown, and senior running back Mike Lawrence ran one yard for the third. With two seconds remaining in the second quarter, Gramatica put a 39-yarder between the uprights for a 24-3 halftime score.

The Cats showed no mercy in the second half. While Mizzou never entered K-State territory in the third quarter, Bishop trotted three yards into the end zone for his second rushing touchdown of the game. On the following possession, Bishop then connected with McDonald on a 44-yard line drive in the end zone for another touchdown.

In the fourth, Gramatica kicked a 32-yard field goal to put the score at 41-3. But with 2:56 remaining in the game, Jones got loose from the Cat defense and did what Bishop had done all day — he ran. This time, it was for a 22-yard rushing touchdown. Jones' pass to Tiger wideout Kent Layman was good for a two-point conversion.

Jones averages 85.8 yards rushing and 127.8 yards passing per game. Although he barely reached his averages against the Cats, the rest of the Tiger offense only accounted for 54 yards of total offensive numbers.

"I think we made up our minds that we weren't going to play," Jones said. "I think we got down on ourselves against a good team, and you can't do that."

Snyder said this Missouri victory closes the book on last week's Nebraska loss.

"I'm proud of the people we have in our program," Snyder said. "They understand what winning is about and what losing is about. When you get waxed like we did last week, you better put it behind you."

Junior linebacker Jeff Kelly said the intense week of practice the Cats had before Saturday's game ended with the desired result.

"On Monday, everybody came out fired up," Kelly said. "We just knew we couldn't look back."

Homecoming sparks competition

KRISTIN BOYD
staff reporter

Greek Homecoming at K-State has changed from the traditional yard art in the 1930s to body building in the 1990s.

In the '30s, when students danced to the music of Matton Betton and his orchestra in the main ballroom of the K-State Student Union, they also took an active part in Homecoming activities.

To show their school spirit, most of the fraternities and sororities decorated their houses.

"During Homecoming, the yard art was a big competition between the houses. We also had a Homecoming queen," Mary Dexter, a 1934 graduate of K-State, said.

Each sorority and residence hall voted on a woman to represent its house. The queen was announced during the halftime of the football game.

In the 1950s, a time when students danced to jukebox music and enjoyed afternoon cola dates, Homecoming was one of the biggest events of the year.

In the '50s, K-State continued the tradition of having a Homecoming queen. The sororities cheered and made posters to promote their house candidates.

"I remember cheering a Mickey Mouse song on campus. We replaced the words Mickey Mouse with our house's candidate, who was Eunice House that year. It was a lot of fun," Fran Logback, a member of the Pi Beta Phi sorority in the 1950s, said.

Fraternities and sororities also would transform their houses with elaborate decorations.

"We would spend numerous hours staying up nights to finish our displays right before the competition," Logback said.

During the '50s, fraternities and sororities participated in what was known as "Tramp Day." This new event allowed the entire campus to see how students looked after working on floats and house decorations. Their attire was worn all day and for the pep rally and Homecoming dance that night.

The 1970s saw fraternities and sororities once again electing a Homecoming queen and attending the traditional football game.

"The biggest thing was to have a date to the football game. The girls would get all dressed up in hose and heels for the game, and the guys would bring their dates a mum," Carolyn Francis, a 1972 K-State graduate, said.

In the '70s, Homecoming activities also included a Homecoming concert.

In 1971, Three Dog Night performed. This group, along with Danny Cox, a folk singer, drew 10,000 students to Ahearn Field House.

In the 1990s, Homecoming is a weeklong competition between the different houses.

The biggest change is that the fraternities and sororities now participate in body building. Students practice months ahead of time in preparation for this competition.

"This was a big part of Homecoming and was actually my favorite part because it was a great way to meet the guys in the fraternity that you were partnered up with," Valerie Kalny, a 1994 K-State graduate, said.

During the week, each fraternity and sorority also participate in "Pant the Chant." This is a cheer that each fraternity and sorority makes up to show their enthusiasm and school spirit.

At the football game, two K-State ambassadors are announced. This takes the place of the crowning of a Homecoming king and queen.

Teen sentenced for killings

ASSOCIATED PRESS

EPHRATA, Wash. — A 16-year-old student who turned an assault rifle on his algebra class will serve two life sentences plus 205 years for killing two classmates and a teacher.

Barry Loukaitis, 16, was convicted of two counts of aggravated first-degree murder last month for killing Manuel Vela and Arnold Fritz, both 14. His sentencing Friday came after victims' relatives spoke.

Vela's father — also named Manuel — introduced himself as "the father of Manuel Vela Jr.," adding bitterly, "The name 'Junior' kind of says it all, doesn't it?"

He read letters from other family members, including one from his son Nicolas, who wrote: "I was 9 years old when my brother was murdered.

I'm still sleeping in my parents' room at night."

Loukaitis was sentenced to two mandatory life terms without hope of parole for the attack at Frontier Junior High School in Moses Lake on Feb. 2, 1996. He could not get the death penalty because of his age.

The additional sentences were for convictions on second-degree murder in the death of teacher Leona Caires, first-degree assault for critically wounding another student, 16 counts of kidnapping for holding the class at gunpoint and one count of second-degree assault.

Louakitis, 14 at the time of the attack, had pleaded innocent by reason of insanity. While jurors rejected the plea, psychiatrists on both sides agreed the boy suffers from depressive illness.

Though the life sentences were a foregone conclusion, Friday's hearing was crowded with relatives of the victims who came to make statements or watch. Loukaitis bowed his head as a representative from each victim's family spoke.

LOOKINGback

1951 - For the first time, a football with a rubber covering was used. Georgia Tech whipped Louisiana State 25-7. The game was played in Atlanta.

1957 - On this night, two superstars introduced a new car on ABC-TV. Bing Crosby and Frank Sinatra joined forces in an hour-long special that turned out to be a big ratings hit. Too bad the Edsel, the car Ford Motor Co. was introducing, didn't fare as well.

THE GAMER

STORE BRINGS TOGETHER GAMING CLIENTELE

LESLEY BAKER
staff reporter

When people walk into The Gamer, owner Steve Elder is usually seated at the long, felt-covered table that dominates the room, elbow-deep in the game of the day. What is so seductive about gaming that it's kept a 30-year-old man with a wife and two children enthralled?

"The people I've met have been the best people," Elder said. "They're nice. Back when I was in college and played five, six times a week, I gamed with 100 different people. That's how many people play."

"It's huge," John Pickle, senior in fine arts, said of Manhattan's gaming population. "Towns this size don't have gaming this huge. It's mostly the college crowds and the Army."

"For war-gaming," Dax Berg, former owner of Dax's Games, said, "The average age is 18 to 29."

"It's amazing," Elder said. "There's a place called Tabletop in Lenexa. They do $10,000 a month just in lead miniatures. There's a lot of people that just buy the figurines and paints."

The Gamer offers figurines, along with comics, role-playing games, miniatures and a slew of other items. It also has a different tournament almost every day, including the card game Magic.

Elder's been a gamer since 1978, when he first played Dungeons and Dragons. According to him, that's what got him hooked. After that, he got into comic book collecting. When he decided to open his own store, he already had most of the experience he would need in ordering merchandise.

"The main reason I do this," Elder said, "is because I love it. It's my thing."

The Gamer has been in operation in the space that once housed Dax's Games since Aug. 1. The store seems to have been widely accepted by the surrounding gaming community.

"It's incredible," Pickle said. "It's awesome. There are no words to describe it. It's a reunion of two groups of gamers that needed to get together."

"It's a union of two stores," Berg said. "There was Dax's Games and Wyrd Raven. The clientele sort of merged together under a new leadership."

"For us older gamers, it's social," said Elder of the store. "For the younger kids, it's a hobby. It gets them off the street. That's what I really care about. You get the kids that are used to hanging around the streets of Aggieville, and you get 'em in, teach them a game. I'm in a position where I can teach kids stuff."

The Gamer took the idea of Dax's Games and expanded on it, Berg said. More merchandise is available, and most of those who come into the new store are older customers who went to the Wyrd Raven and Dax's Games when they were open. The Gamer serves as a meeting place for old gamers, but new gamers are always welcome, Elder said.

"I have a core of college students," Elder said. "But there's a lot I haven't reached yet. I did that K-Radio advertising, but that was pretty expensive."

The Gamer is also expanding. Elder has just won the bid for Galaxy Comics.

"I have a huge warehouse full of products," Elder said.

The Gamer is at 12th and Laramie streets in the Laramie Plaza.

'Joseph' swirls into McCain at rapid-fire pace

SCOTT M. LADD
editor in chief

If any of the near sellout crowd thought they were in for a traditional rendition of the last 13 chapters of Genesis, they surely thought differently when the electric guitar greeted them before "Joseph and the Amazing Technicolor Dreamcoat" began.

Review Theater

"Joseph," a 23-scene Tim Rice and Andrew Lloyd Webber musical collaboration, was presented Saturday in McCain Auditorium.

In the musical, Jacob gives his son, Joseph (Joe Machota), a coat made of many colors, much to the ire of his 11 brothers. From the outset, the brothers seek to do away with precognitive-dream interpreter Joseph and his coat.

But first, the brothers and the dreamcoat make debuts in a splashy, color-enriched roust of tomfoolery that smacked of old Warner Brothers cartoons.

How else can one describe 11 brothers pouring out a tent after the show's opening number begins with a pink-and-baby-blue curtain raising?

By the end of Scene 6, the brothers have sold Joseph into slavery and destroyed his coat with a little help from a passing goat.

In a ironic, stereotypical country-western mourning song that tosses in square-dancing and two-stepping, the brothers tell Jacob his son is "one more angel in heaven."

That's where the story really picks up and the color palette becomes muted.

Joseph becomes a slave for Potiphar, a lesser ruler in Egypt. While working for Potiphar, a glitzy showgirl known as Mrs. Potiphar seduces Joseph, with Joseph getting caught and sent to prison.

What once was a pyramid cast in green light becomes the background as a window shaped like an eye drops a gray cast across the stage.

The only light comes filtered through the window, falling upon Joseph — chained to a rock and realizing his life is full of doom and gloom, much like the set's colors.

In Joseph's bittersweet "Close Every Door," the audience discovers how far Joseph's life has fallen.

Enter the other captives, a butler and baker seeking Joseph to interpret their dreams. The audience falls under the rapture of Joseph's rise to self-belief during a rollicking "Go, Go, Go Joseph," that ends with Joseph standing on his chained rock and the impending intermission.

Quickly, the audience is brought back into the story as Joseph is sought out by the butler, who is still alive, unlike the baker — much as Joseph had interpreted the dreams to mean.

It seems the Pharaoh can't sleep without having cryptic dreams and needs Joseph to explain them.

Joseph listens as the Pharaoh, in a gaudy but true-to-life Elvis impersonation replete with pelvic thrusts and sideburns, tells Joseph the dreams.

Joseph explains the kingdom will have seven years of bounty and seven years of famine and advises the Pharaoh while becoming prime minister.

Not shabby for a slave-prisoner who was ousted by his family.

But wait, his family, in a writhingly humorous Italian-manner explain how much their life is lacking since Joseph was sold into slavery and search out the Pharaoh to provide them with food.

Throw in a calypso number that has the brothers defending one of their own after being framed by Joseph, and everything comes together as Joseph reveals he is still alive and well and his dreams have come true.

While Joseph and the Narrator (Jennifer Shrader) perform the powerful duet, "Any Dream Will Do," that uses both their vocal ranges to their limits, the modest set is struck behind the Technicolor curtain.

Then the thumping groove of the "Joseph Megamix" weaves the soloists through reprises of their earlier performances while the company members shake their booties.

It is strong points like suitcase-carrying slaves, the brothers duded-up in cowboy attire, an over-the-top Elvis impersonation and the Narrator weaving and directing the story while wearing sequins and carrying notes McCain's sound system couldn't handle that make the musical fun.

Webber and Rice's "Joseph" manages to tie together multiple music genres, a biblical story and contemporary language to make a traveling show worthy of its roots.

The only thing that could have made this fast-paced extravaganza better would have been the addition of Joseph's 50 children, chosen locally, that usually appear in the musical's travels.

More than 40 students 'assassinated' in fund raiser

LESLEY BAKER
staff reporter

People are being assassinated in Moore Hall. The weapons being used are water pistols and stealth.

Residents of Moore Hall are participating in an assassins game called Gotcha. The object of the game is to kill the target and not be killed. Sign-up for Gotcha was Sept. 23-24. The game started Sept. 29. Participants paid a $2 entry fee and picked up a target's profile, which included a picture complete with name, height, weight, major and alias at the front desk. At noon on Sept. 29, the paranoia really began.

The rules state there can be no witnesses to the assassinations. Stalking targets is allowed all over campus except for bathrooms, computer rooms, weight rooms, Hale Library, classrooms and places of employment.

Resident assistants' places of employment are fair game. The weapon of choice is a water gun no bigger than the shooter's hand, filled with clear water. The target must be hit by the water to die. No kidnapping is allowed. The game is over when one person is left alive.

"I died at 1:30 pm on Monday," Courtney Pitzer, sophomore in chemical engineering, said. "I came back from class. I went up to my room on the ninth floor. I took the elevator. Becky Shepker, who was working at the front desk, saw me and called my assassin, Kelly Brown. They both knew each other. So my assassin went up to my floor. I went to the bathroom, and she was waiting in the phone booth by the bathroom. She shot me as I came out of the bathroom."

The Gotcha game is being played as a fund raiser for the Moore Academic Council.

"Nov. 5 we're having a kind of a social," said Regina Tirella, first-year graduate student in college student personnel and assistant coordinator of Moore Hall. "We need money. We're trying to get the deans of the college and faculty and staff to come over to Moore lobby, see where the students live to meet outside of the classroom."

The Gotcha game has earned more than $120 as a fund raiser.

The mortality rates are high in Moore Hall — 63 signed up, and less than 20 people are still alive.

Activist's campaign to ban mines wins Nobel Peace Prize

ASSOCIATED PRESS

An American and her campaign to ban land mines around the world won the Nobel Peace Prize on Friday, instantly adding momentum to one of the causes Princess Diana championed.

The prize — endowed a century ago by the inventor of dynamite — went to Jody Williams, coordinator of the International Campaign to Ban Landmines. The Norwegian Nobel Committee said Williams had transformed a ban on anti-personnel mines from a vision to a feasible reality.

Boris Yeltsin promptly pledged his support to Williams' cause, announcing that Russia would sign a global treaty to ban land mines.

That leaves the United States and China as the only prominent countries to refuse to sign the treaty banning the export and use of anti-personnel mines.

"It's a wake-up call for the United States. I would think that Bill Clinton would find it hard to keep saying he's a leader on this if he doesn't sign the treaty," Williams said from her home in Putney, Vt.

Williams will split the $1 million prize with her 5-year-old group, made up of 1,000 organizations in more than 55 countries.

> "I could make out the campaign and my name, and then I knew it was real."
> • Jody Williams
> Nobel Peace Prize winner

The move to ban land mines has proceeded with unusual speed this year, with pressure growing after the August death of Princess Diana, who had been the most visible supporter of the ban.

Yeltsin's decision — announced just hours after the prize was awarded — and the Nobel Peace Prize are certain to increase the pressure on the United States to join the more than 90 countries that back the treaty.

White House spokesman Mike McCurry said President Clinton had no intention of altering his stand on mines.

"The president is absolutely rock-solid confident that he's got the right approach that protects our interests, and what's in the interests is eliminating the scourge of land mines," McCurry said.

McCurry said the administration continues to believe a treaty must provide some exceptions — including allowances for the use of certain land mines on the Korean Peninsula — to protect U.S. troops. About 37,000 American troops are stationed in South Korea as a deterrent.

At least 100 million anti-personnel mines, often called the seeds of death, are planted in more than 60 countries around the world. The weapons kill or mame 26,000 people a year, more than 80 percent of them civilians.

U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan telephoned Williams to say her winning the Nobel Peace Prize was a victory for every child and mother and all vulnerable societies.

Williams' coalition began humbly in 1992, with one office in Washington and one in Europe "so we could call it the international campaign," she said.

Williams, whose birthday was on Thursday, learned of the award around 5 a.m. from a Norwegian TV station.

"They played the announcement, which was in Norwegian," she said. "I could make out the campaign and my name, and then I knew it was real."

Williams, who has master's degrees in international studies, was working for a temporary agency in Washington, D.C., in 1981 when her activist career was sparked by a leaflet that someone handed her as she stepped off a subway.

She became active in working to change U.S. policy in Central America. Through that work, she met leaders of the Vietnam Veterans of America Foundation who were helping land mine victims obtain artificial limbs.

"They really quickly recognized that just putting limbs on people was (ineffective) if you didn't go to the root of the problem," she said.

The Nobel Prizes are always awarded on the Dec. 10 anniversary of the death of Alfred Nobel, the Swede who made a fortune by inventing dynamite.

Nobel endowed the prizes in his 1895 will. He turned to peace causes when he became disillusioned with dynamite, which he had thought would make war obsolete by making it so horrible.

The peace prize, first awarded in 1901, is presented in Oslo. The other Nobel prizes are presented in Stockholm.

School shooting causes speculation about cult activity

ASSOCIATED PRESS

PEARL, Miss. — Stan Harrell swears he'll never fuss at his daughter, 16-year-old Kelly, for being late to school again. If she had been on time on Oct. 1, she would have been in the line of fire when the shooting started.

Thursday night, Stan overheard his daughter in her room. Like many in this largely Baptist community of 22,000 people, she was praying.

What folks here are wondering now is just who some of the other children in town might have been praying to.

In the aftermath of the killings and arrests, there is dark talk of a satanic cult, of a clique of misfit teens who dressed in black and called themselves "The Group." Prosecutors and civic leaders seem to think there might be something to it.

Last Friday, police found a sheet of scorched paper, its edges burned to form a jagged edge, taped to a Pearl High School wall next to the main entrance. On it, someone had drawn a skull and crossbones and an Iron Cross and written the words: "Luke is God. From your friends at Pearl High School."

Luke would be Luke Woodham, the 16-year-old who is charged with slashing his mother to death with a butcher knife and then opening fire on his classmates with a rifle.

He is accused of killing Lydia Dew, 17, and his former girlfriend, Christina Menefee, and wounding seven other students, leaving them bleeding on the floor of the school cafeteria.

Roy Balentine, the principal, dashed out of his office when he heard the first shots.

"I ran out to see if something possibly malfunctioned," he said. "I was hoping that's what it was, but I knew it sounded like gunshots."

He saw Woodham about 15 or 20 feet away, wearing a big, blue coat and holding a rifle. Balentine dangled both arms to show how Woodham held the rifle low out in front of him.

Fearing Woodham would come for him next, Balentine ran to his office to call the police. As he dialed, more shots rang out. More students fell.

Minutes later, Assistant Principal Joel Myrick chased Woodham down outside the school and held him at bay with a .45-caliber automatic pistol he kept in his truck in the school parking lot. He forced Woodham to the ground and put his foot on the youth's neck.

"I think he's a coward," Myrick said. "I had my weapon pointed at his face, and he didn't want to die."

It seemed an open-and-shut case — a single young gunman.

But then, a week later, six other teens, described as Woodham's friends, were taken to jail on charges that they had conspired to murder Pearl High School students and some of their parents.

There had been whispers that some kids in town might have been toying with the occult. In the aftermath, townspeople have latched onto the rumors as an explanation for the seemingly unexplainable.

"On the street, they're talking about some devil cults, and I'm sure there's good reason for that," said Mayor Jimmie Foster, whose son was allegedly targeted by Woodham but was late for school that day.

Foster, a former Pearl police officer, said that over the years, there have been scattered signs of cult activity in town. "Cult signs, maybe a couple of pets missing, but we never found the carcasses," he said.

The Rev. Martin Ruane, whose St. Jude's Catholic Church is just a few homes away from where Luke Woodham's rampage began, said he counseled a local teen-ager last year because he had "some involvement in this devil-type thing." But he said he doubts that 17-year-old Wesley Brownell, a parishioner who was among those arrested and charged with conspiracy to murder, was involved in such things.

Delbert Shaw, whose son Delbert, 18, was among those arrested, asserted that "some of the boys were in a cult" and that "they tried to recruit my son."

"But my son hasn't done anything," he said. "He wasn't in a cult, and that's all I have to say."

Prosecutor John Kitchens, Rankin County's district attorney, said his investigation "has led us to believe that there is satanic activity occurring in this county." He said he has not ruled out the idea that the youths arrested this month are involved.

Ed Rainer, attorney for one of the youths, Grant Boyette, 18, of nearby Brandon, called the demonic rumors nonsense. But the talk is everywhere.

Manhattan Jewish community celebrates Yom Kippur

JON KURCHE
Contributing Writer

The year is now 5758.

It is, at least, for K-State's Jewish students and professors. This weekend, local Jewish people celebrated Yom Kippur, the day of atonement for the Jewish faith and the holiday that marks the end of the New Year. Here in Manhattan, many took part in traditional ceremonies.

"It means a time for me to reflect," Sara Emeson, president of K-State's Hillel chapter (a Jewish student organization), said. "A time for me to get close — closer — to God, and it meant time with my family, which was nice."

Yom Kippur is a celebration that is referred to in Hebrew as "Yamim Nora'im" or "days of awe." For many, it is the most hallowed day in the year, and different people will celebrate in different ways. From sunset at the beginning of Yom Kippur to sunset the following evening, some choose to fast, some go without modern conveniences, such as phones and motor vehicles, and some even avoid wearing leather shoes.

"From sundown to sunset, many people fast," Emeson said. "After services we break the fast together... . I like to follow the traditions."

David Margolies, professor of entomology, said the holiday brings out a sense of community.

"It's open. Anybody can come," Margolies said. "We all lead the service, we're all involved in it, and at the end we break the fast right at the synagogue, and everyone's together."

The sense of togetherness comes from being part of a small community, according to Norman Fedder, distinguished professor of speech.

"When I was in New York City, I actually belonged to a [Jewish] community as small as ours," Fedder said. "A small community within a large community .... It's like a family, it's like a family gathering."

Although there are fewer than 6 million Jewish people nationwide, Kansas has a population of just more than 14,000. This means that in this state, Jewish people compose about 0.6 percent of the population, a fact that becomes apparent in communities like Manhattan, which boasts between 30 and 50 Jewish families.

"What I've found with the people I've met is that a lot of them are, like, 'Oh my gosh, I've never met a Jew before,' then they go into this initial shock," Emeson said. "Then they start asking questions, which I think is really great."

The lack of general knowledge, however, does create a different climate.

"I suppose that one of the differences would be that in New York and Israel, you're very conscious it's a holiday because everyone around you and in the street goes to or lives by a synagogue," Fedder said. "In a Jewish neighborhood in New York, schools would be closed. Here, there was no sense, so it's a private thing."

The services were at the Manhattan Jewish Congregation, 1509 Wreath Ave., on Friday night and Saturday. Even without a rabbi to lead the congregation, local participants carried on with the traditions.

"We have a synagogue here, and we go to services the night before, and we spent the day yesterday at services," Margolies said. "We all just take turns leading the services."

To some, having a rabbi to lead services might make things more comfortable.

"Back home, we always had a rabbi, and here we don't," Emeson said. "The congregation takes turns — so that's really different. Here I'd kind of like to have a rabbi."

Others feel the absence of a rabbi has some benefit.

"You're not focused on a rabbi or cantor — in some ways it's very communal," Fedder said. "We actually hosted a family from Salina — we had people coming from surrounding communities ... on Friday night we had a full house, and it was interesting, too, when they were reading names of the deceased. I was struck by that, it's such a small community, it's like a family."

SHOOTING

who only gave his first name, Chris, talked darkly of a devil-worship church by a gated road in the woods north of the school.

Dried bones of small animals are scattered about the area, but there is also a lot of other garbage there — empty buckets, old wire spools, worn-out tires and rotting shoes. Satanic church or unofficial garbage dump?

Investigators and students say there is no question Woodham and his friends — described by Balentine as highly intelligent students — kept largely to themselves, mostly wore black and were often teased because they were different.

"There was a few you could tell something wasn't right with," Nikki Miller, 16, said.

But Woodham's friends have offered police an alternative explanation for the shootings — one that has nothing to do with devil worship. They say Woodham told them he was just plain angry because he was sick of being picked on.

Now, Balentine is trying to get his school back to normal. A trophy case cracked in the shooting has been replaced. Football games are going ahead as scheduled. Cheerleaders stayed after school last week to practice their routines.

"The best thing we can do to get things back on track is to go about business as usual," he said. "This is something we will never forget, but we can put it behind us and move forward. Life must go on."

But signs of sorrow remain. On the school grounds, blue ribbons are tied around the willows and oaks. Colored remnants of melted candles surround the flag pole. Sympathy cards from school sponsors, neighboring campuses and supporters adorn the walls. Uniformed police officers patrol the campus.

The American flag at city hall has hung at half-staff for more than a week. The sign board, which usually announces football games and summer picnics, offers a silent plea:

"God Help Us Heal."

Currently, the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics is required to guarantee 7,500 student seats for football games. But Urick said his department has upped that number every year to meet demand, one reason for the expansion.

This year, 9,471 seats were provided. That increase in student seats means less revenue, though, which is one reason for the expansion, Urick said.

> "I don't think it's feasible to talk about it for next season. Construction would definitely start right after the last game next year, though."
> • Max Urick
> athletic director

"I'm trying to generate as much revenue as I can, but for the student tickets that I sell that are over the 7,500, I'm losing $100 per ticket. I don't want to do that, but I also don't want the students out. I want them there," he said.

Another reason for the expansion, Urick said, is the congestion caused by temporary bleachers placed on the south end of the stadium to meet demand. He also said temporary chairs in the end zone aren't adequate seats.

"If the demand is there, we will continue to sell them, but I wouldn't pay to sit in them," he said.

For those reasons, Urick said, the athletic department obtained estimates and plans for expanding the stadium — at a price he estimated at $11 million.

Two ideas are up for consideration, Urick said. Both involve significant changes on the upper east side of the stadium and complete renovation of the older sets of restrooms and concession stands.

Expanding the concession stand by more than 20 suites is also included in the proposal; the suites, Urick said, would provide considerable revenue that would be put toward paying off the 15-year expansion bond. The east parking lot would also be resurfaced.

In the larger of the two proposals, seats would also be added on the north ends of both sides of the stadium, curving in toward Vanier Football Complex. More seats would also be added on the east upper deck than in the smaller proposal.

Using student fees to fund the project would mean a higher number of reserved seats for students, Urick said. The larger of the two plans would guarantee at least 10,000 student seats per year in exchange for a $1 per-credit-hour privilege fee hike. Student ticket prices would be frozen for four years, and the department would also offer recent K-State graduates a 66-percent ticket discount.

The smaller plan would guarantee at least 9,000 reserved student seats for a 50 cent per-hour privilege fee. Ticket prices and alumni discounts are similar to the larger proposal.

Urick presented a list of five revenue sources that would pay for the expansion: a privilege fee, gameday-parking revenue, new chair back seating on the stadium's east side, new press box suites and new club seating in the press box. Besides a privilege fee, the other four revenue sources would generate two-thirds of the necessary funds, he said.

Urick said the proposed expansion could be complete by the 1999 season, but there's no way to speed up the project to have it ready by next year because it needs approval from the university, the Kansas Board of Regents, the legislature and others.

"I don't think it's feasible to talk about it for next season," Urick said. "Construction would definitely start right after the last game next year, though."

code meetings.

Trujillo said the Course Information Proposal Committee will be looking for volunteers to administer the proposed evaluation, which would allow students to evaluate core curriculum courses.

The committee will meet Oct. 23.

The evaluations will be tested in some classes this year and might be included with teacher evaluations.

Eventually, Trujillo said he hopes these evaluations can be published to show students what their peers thought of the course.

SHERIFF

released from the jail, told The Joplin Globe, "I intend to continue fulfilling my duties as the elected sheriff of Cherokee County for as long as possible. I'm not going to comment on the charges now."

Collins' attorney, Kent Lynch of Baxter Springs, Kan., said the sheriff had agreed voluntarily to meet with KBI agents at the courthouse Friday after being advised of the charges.

"The KBI played that up big in front of the crowd on the courthouse square for Columbus Days activities. They made Pat put his hands up in the air and then handcuffed him before taking him to Oswego," Lynch said. "That was absolutely not necessary."

Lynch said he and the sheriff have not seen the specific allegations in the charges filed against Collins.

Allen County District Judge John White allowed the sheriff to remain free on his own recognizance, without actually posting a bond, Lynch said.

"He said the sheriff has shown up for other court proceedings, and there is no reason to believe he won't be present for any in the future," Lynch said.

Collins was charged last year with 10 felony counts of misuse of public funds, but the attorney general's office is waiting for an appeals court decision in another case to determine if the sheriff's actions were illegal.

Because he is an elected official, Collins can continue his duties until he is convicted of a crime.

The four current employees of his office who are charged would be subject to the county's personnel policy manual regarding the status of their jobs.

Lynch said the Cherokee County Commission would hold a special meeting Tuesday to discuss that issue.

COMMERCE

Union, said students need to understand that no matter what bank had been chosen, students would have had to have to pay somewhere along the line.

Pitts agreed some sort of fee would have been implemented.

"Regardless of which bank we went with, we'd still be in the same situation, because banks look at ways to assist themselves with future accounts," Pitts said.

However, the Union directors insisted Commerce Bank remains a service accessible to all students, faculty and staff, regardless of whether they have Wildcat accounts with the bank.

Haggart said Commerce understands the needs of students and also offers cashing of two-party and personal checks. The limit, however, is $50 for those without accounts.

"Students have money coming in from parents at home, and it's our basic understanding that students share the costs of rent, groceries and who knows what else," Thoman said. "Commerce needs to continue to give them the service of check cashing that some can't take elsewhere in town."

The main idea behind allowing a bank to provide for the Wildcat Card account, said Thoman, is to always be something the Union can offer as a service to the students.

"It has never been a forced-upon thing," he said. "If Commerce Bank opened their doors in the morning and no one came in, then that's the students exercising their voice against it. We've taken the issues to the students' level."

However, as a result of the new check-cashing fees, the information counter will also begin charging 25 cents in January. K-State is the last Kansas Board of Regents university to provide free check cashing.

Pitts said that earlier in the year, Union Governing Board implemented a maximum check-cashing amount of $20 at the counter so students would not take advantage of the free services at the information counter instead of paying at the bank.

Union, therefore, why limit our ability to maximize that brand, which translates to your rent, by effectively reducing our sales capacity through limited beverages?" Downey asked in the letter.

According to the letter, negotiations won't be an option.

"Without the complete package listed (in the proposal), McDonald's recognizes inherent weaknesses in the Food Court scenario which will prevent us from securing that profit, and consequently increasing our business risk beyond the reasonable limits that we have defined through our experience.

"Therefore, if any one of the items is unacceptable to the Union, then McDonald's experience demands we bow out of the process," Downey said in the letter.

Carney said UGB would like to resubmit bids for a hamburger vender, but can't until McDonald's negotiations are terminated.

"We cannot resubmit for more bids until we complete negotiations with them. We would like to resubmit to a Sonic or Wendy's or even an A&W-type concept. We can't do that until we're through negotiating with McDonald's," he said.

Carney said even though 65 percent of K-State students polled a few years ago wanted McDonald's as the grill-type restaurant in the Food Court, any burger establishment should be successful. Striking a deal with McDonald's isn't crucial to the Union or Food Court's success, he said.

"It's our position that any burger concept that we bring in is going to be successful. We have to consider the profitability of the business as well as the profitability of the Union," Carney said.

Though the search for a name-brand grill in the Union will continue, a new restaurant won't mean the complete loss of the Stateroom Grill, though extensive changes to that area have been one goal of the renovation project, he said.

"That is an absolute goal. That was one of the items brought up when the renovation project was first brought forward. Students polled said that they wanted ... more of a name brand concept in the food court," Carney said.

But popular breakfast items and other foods won't be taken away, he said.

"They're not giving up the biscuits and gravy, and they're not giving up the hash browns that are so popular. Those sorts of foods would stay. They could do a breakfast-type menu and then a chicken coup-type sandwich place with poultry and other sandwich items and lunch foods. They just wouldn't deal with the hamburger items any more, though," Carney said.

on in Manhattan, so we're running into some difficulties," Shafer said.

The new center will include space for alumni, campus and community events.

There have been some concerns about making the new center fit the location. Whatever design is chosen will have to fit the stadium's character.

"It will definitely complement Memorial Stadium," Shafer said.

Cost estimates for the new building are as high as $6 million. Renz said plans call for all money to be collected through private donations.

successful, but Amigos has had difficulties from the minute that they've opened," Carney said.

He said no concrete plans are in place to close the franchise, but UGB will continue to look into Mexican food options for the Stateroom.

College of Agriculture strives for diversity

TONYA ALLOWAY
staff reporter

Not limited by a stereotype of the Midwest farmer, the College of Agriculture is actively recruiting students from different backgrounds into the program.

In fact, employers are looking for more graduates who belong to minority groups and have more diverse backgrounds, said Jackie McClaskey, assistant director of academic programs for the College of Agriculture.

McClaskey said there is a shortage of employees in the agriculture field.

"The jobs are there," she said. "They wouldn't be taken away from one group and given to another."

The College of Agriculture started a program last spring with the Kansas City East High School, where McClaskey and a group of faculty and students did a workshop on the importance of attending college.

They also brought 60 students from the high school to K-State for workshops and tours and to expose students to the college.

The K-State group wanted to increase the numbers at K-State as well as the numbers in the College of Agriculture.

McClaskey said it is an ongoing partnership with the high school, and immediate results weren't expected. However, one student from Kansas City East is a freshman this year at K-State and plans to enter the College of Agriculture.

Additional schools have been contacted in Wichita, Junction City and Topeka. McClaskey said these schools probably will take longer to develop a partnership like the one at Kansas City East.

Eventually, the recruitment program will include summer programs and conferences, but McClaskey said more funding would be needed.

She said she would pursue corporate funding or grant money for the program.

So far, the program has been funded by the College of Agriculture operating budget and basic recruitment money, but the expenses have been limited.

The areas most affected by the program will deal with science, business, environment and communications because these areas have the most job opportunities.

Less than 4 percent of the students now in the College of Agriculture are minorities, McClaskey said. She said she hopes to at least double that number, but the probability of success isn't known yet.

McClaskey said that because the program will take time to get results, evaluation will probably take place in the spring of 1999.

She said one student is viewed as success, but she doesn't want to limit her possibilities or be unrealistic.

"Right now, we want to get into the schools, do the program and see if it does work," McClaskey said.

The benefits don't end with the students involved in the recruitment program, however, she said.

"I think everyone benefits from diversifying the college," McClas-key said. "It improves the total educational experience for all of our students."

Sheriff, deputies arrested in Cherokee County

ASSOCIATED PRESS

COLUMBUS, Kan. — Cherokee County Sheriff Pat Collins, three of his deputies, a former deputy and a jail employee have been arrested on felony and misdemeanor charges, Attorney General Carla Stovall said Saturday.

The arrests late Friday followed a four-month investigation by the Kansas Bureau of Investigation and an inquisition last week, Stovall said in a news release. The alleged incidents occurred between June 1995 and the present.

Collins was charged with 10 felonies — six counts of aggravated battery, two counts of aiding an escape and two counts of filing a fraudulent income tax return. He also was charged with nine misdemeanors, all involving mistreatment of a confined person.

Further information on the basis for the charges was not immediately available.

The three deputies and the charges against them were:

• Robert Thomas — one felony count of aggravated battery, four felony counts of making a false information, four misdemeanor counts of official misconduct, one misdemeanor count of mistreatment of a confined person and one misdemeanor count of theft.

• Terry Clugston — one felony count of aggravated battery, one felony count of making a false information, one misdemeanor count of mistreatment of a confined person and two misdemeanor counts of official misconduct.

• Mike Adams is charged with one felony count of aggravated battery.

Former deputy David Justice is charged with one felony count of making a false information and one misdemeanor of mistreatment of a confined person. Freddy Fry, an employee in the Cherokee County jail, is charged with one misdemeanor count of mistreatment of a confined person.

Stovall said her office joined the investigation at the request of Cherokee County Attorney Sam Marsh.

All those arrested were booked into the Labette County jail in Parsons. A first hearing on the charges has been scheduled for Thursday.

In a brief statement Saturday, Collins, who was

McDonald's pulls bid for placement in K-State Union

LAURA POPE
staff reporter

It wasn't a debate about Coke or Pepsi, but of distribution of beverage profits from the potential McDonald's in the K-State Student Union Food Court that initiated problems in a bid from the company.

Union Director Bernard Pitts said the McDonald's Corporation withdrew its bid to locate in the Union at the Union Governing Board meeting Monday.

In a facsimile directed to Pitts on Sept. 10, McDonald's said their decision was based on two things. After analyzing the facts, they didn't feel they would be able to "generate enough sales to be profitable to the McDonald's system" and believed that the "competition of beverage sales by K-State creates an environment wherein we would be unable to effectively compete with your pricing."

"The beverage aspect was so important to our bid," Pitts said. "We think there are other companies out there."

The board approved a motion 12-0 allowing Pitts to pursue other hamburger establishments for the space in the Union.

The contract involves opening a restaurant in the Union's new Food Court scheduled to be in place 10 months into the expansion project. The establishment would have a seven-year contract with the Union, operating through the remaining 14 months of the expansion process, Pitts said.

Pitts said he plans to talk with other national brands like A & W Restaurant, Burger King, Sonic Drive-In and Wendy's. However, UGB is not seeking out a national brand.

UGB Faculty Representative Carl Boger said the Union is not a good piece of property for potential national brands.

"You don't have the foot traffic," Boger said. "The Union can only handle one major brand."

The Union currently has two franchises, Amigos and Manchu Wok, in operation. Pitts said both establishments are working out well and having a high level of success.

"There was an error made in the report on Amigos. They have indicated that their sales volume hasn't reached their potential, but they are satisfied with their location and they are profitable," Pitts said. "They intend to expand their menu when they go into the new Food Court."

Committee requests stadium referendum

SARA BURDETTE
staff reporter

The Privilege Fee Committee on Monday night called for a referendum for the expansion of KSU Stadium.

The referendum would allow students to offer opinions on the expansion. It needs Student Senate approval before it can go before students and is scheduled to be introduced to Senate on Thursday.

The referendum offers three provisions that will come with the expansion.

First, the referendum states there will be an increase in seats from 7,500 to 9,000 or 10,000. Second, it proposes to freeze basketball and football ticket prices for the next four years. Third, K-State alumni who have graduated within the past two years will be allowed to purchase football and basketball tickets at 66 percent of the public rate.

Aaron Truax, committee co-chair, said alumni get discounted tickets because they are just starting jobs and don't have a lot of money.

The referendum asks students whether they support the expansion. If they do, they can choose between two options for fee payment.

The first option would add $1 per credit hour to privilege fees and would guarantee 10,000 seats. The fee would be a maximum of $24 per student for 15 years. Ticket prices would be $60 per student for four years and would give graduates of the past two years the 66-percent discount.

The second option is similar to the first, but it will guarantee 9,000 seats at

Landon Lecture Series now offered on Internet

KRISTIN BOYD
staff reporter

Each year three to five leading personalities appear on the Landon Lecture Series platform. Former presidents Nixon, Ford, Carter, Reagan and Bush all have delivered Landon Lectures, but every year students, faculty and alumni are unable to attend because of varying reasons.

That's going to change.

Alumni, faculty and students who are unable to attend the different speakers now have the option of being able to listen to the Landon Lecture Series on the Internet.

The live broadcast of the Landon Lecture Series is being provided on the Internet by the K-State Division of Continuing Education.

"We thought that this would be an interesting use of technology to extend to students at a distance," Rob Caffey, information systems administrator for the K-State Division of Continuing Education, said.

The Landon Lecture Series' World Wide Web page features past speakers, a history of the Landon Lecture Series and real audio instructions.

"I think the most interesting thing is that you can click on past speakers, and it pulls up a list of them," Caffey said.

One of the past speakers available is

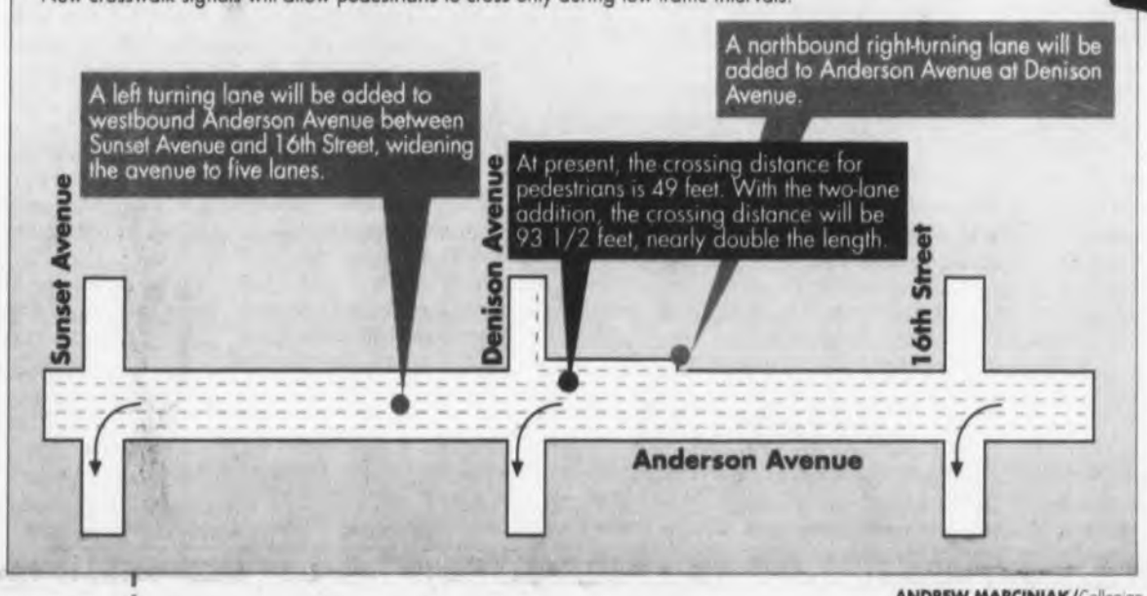
CITY OFFICIALS WANT TO WIDEN ANDERSON AVENUE SOON.
AREA RESIDENTS WANT CITY OFFICIALS TO RE-EXAMINE THE PROJECT.
PEDESTRIAN SAFETY AND CONGESTED ROADS ARE IN THE MIDDLE.

CROSSING VIEWS



ANDERSON AVENUE: THE EXPANSION

STORIES BY TRAVIS D. LENKNER

Expanding Anderson Avenue

Anderson Avenue will receive a $7 million reconstruction between Sunset Avenue and 16th Street. A citizens' awareness group says the widening could pose problems for pedestrians, who would have to traverse nearly double the length of the existing crosswalk at Denison and Anderson Avenues. New crosswalk signals will allow pedestrians to cross only during low traffic intervals.

ANDREW MARCINIAK/Collegian

JOSH EMORY, sophomore in civil engineering, and Nichole Schneider, sophomore in interior architecture, cross Anderson Avenue at the Mid Campus Drive intersection Monday afternoon. A widening of Anderson Avenue would mean longer crosswalks and a change in traffic signals.

Proposed street expansion met by opposition, support

f city officials have their way, construction will begin to make Anderson Avenue wider between 16th Street and Sunset Avenue by 1999.

If Dave MacFarland and other area residents have their way, it won't.

MacFarland is spearheading Anderson Widening Area Residents' Enclave (AWARE) and is the leading opposition of the widening project.

Last Tuesday, MacFarland took his concerns to the City Commission, which has already approved several preliminary steps to the project. Field check plans for the project have been sent to the Kansas Department of Transportation, which will fund much of the project, for approval.

The proposed Anderson construction, when finished, would add a left turning lane between 16th Street and Sunset Avenue, widening the street to five lanes. A right-hand turning lane would also be added between 17th Street and Denison Avenue to accommodate traffic turning toward the K-State campus. Dedicated left-hand turning arrows and coordinated traffic signals would also be part of the project. City Engineer Jack Messer said the combination of all of these elements should make traffic flow more smoothly.

"We have designed a system that is going to allow traffic to move fairly well through the corridor at about 30 mph. It's timed and coordinated in such a way that a vehicle can get through the corridor without the large number of stops and delays that are currently present," Messer said.

But a key point to MacFarland's opposition takes issue with the plan, which he said improves conditions for motorists while making Anderson Avenue worse for pedestrians.

"One of the cases that I make is that the south edge of the K-State campus should be treated like a school zone," MacFarland said. "We have those at elementary and even at high schools because a large volume of people are expected to be crossing

DAWARE raises questions about Anderson widening

Dave MacFarland's opposition to the proposed widening of Anderson Avenue is not just because of the potential dangers it poses for pedestrians. He wants to make citizens and city officials aware of other problems as well.

Led by MacFarland, Anderson Widening Area Residents' Enclave (AWARE) opposes the street construction for two other main reasons: its effect on property along the street and cost effectiveness.

MacFarland objects to the amount of destruction along Anderson Avenue that the project will cause. City officials have already determined that two homes will have to be demolished, and two others might also be lost in the construction.

Also, city officials estimate 180 mature trees will be removed before the project is complete. A newsletter produced by the city and sent to neighborhood residents in the project's early stages said "minimizing impact to residential properties" is among the project's goals. That hasn't been met, MacFarland said.

Another objection raised by MacFarland is the cost effectiveness of the $7 million project, which city statistics say will increase traffic flow by one letter grade rating (from D to C). MacFarland said his documents show that the traffic

After going years without remodeling, greek houses suffering problems

KRIS ROBL
staff reporter

Greek houses at K-State have seen better days, structurally.

At one time they were brand new facilities that provided a comfortable environment for K-State students.

Now these houses are experiencing some electrical and plumbing problems, and problems that occur from many years of use.

Most houses have survived for years and are in need of remodeling or updated

"I think that it's imperative that they update their facilities in order to make room for all the technology that has occurred over the years," Barb Robel, K-State greek adviser, said.

Robel said a few of the technological additions might be more computers with Internet services, security systems and updated fire alarms.

"Another reason to remodel is prospective members are becoming consumer shoppers. They are looking around at the dormitories and other living facilities to see which one will provide the most comfortable living environment," Robel said.

A remodeling process does not occur overnight, though. An uncountable number of hours are being put into this project by greek alumni.

"The first thing you need to do is find your scope," said Dave Fritchen, assistant professor of architectural engineering and construction science and Delta Upsilon chapter adviser. "The alumni and undergraduate chapter need to decide if they are going to remodel or go for a total reconstruction process."

The scope can be found by hiring an architect to make some preliminary drawings of what needs to be renovated or updated. The renovating process can be based on the undergraduate needs and how much money is available to be spent on the project.

The next step is finding out how much support will be given by the alumni.

A feasibility study can be done by a fund-raising corporation to determine how much money can be provided.

Pennington and Company Inc., based in Lawrence, has been doing feasibility studies for a few K-State greek houses.

John Esau, senior consultant for Pennington and Company Inc., said Pennington is helping out seven K-State greek houses: Beta Theta Pi, Delta Tau Delta, Delta Upsilon, FarmHouse, Kappa Kappa Gamma, Phi Kappa Theta and Sigma Alpha Epsilon.

"We first look at the alumni status in the feasibility study," Esau said. "If the feedback looks good, we will roll right into a fund-raising campaign."

The campaign begins when Pennington associates call or speak to alumni in person to determine how much they are willing to give to the construction project. Esau said

News Rewind collects the top campus, local, state, national and world news from the past 48 hours. Briefs are collected from wire and staff reports.

Man caught by dog, arrested in gun shop holdup, slaying

INDIANAPOLIS — A man wanted on charges of killing a gun shop clerk and stealing a cache of weapons in a holdup Oct. 4 was captured in a car chase Monday while wearing a bulletproof vest.

Timothy Greer, 29, was subdued by a police dog after he lost control of the stolen car he was driving and ran into woods near his home. He was taken to a hospital for treatment of dog bites and minor head injuries.

The chase began after a police officer recognized him driving in Indianapolis. Greer was wearing a bulletproof vest and drew a gun, but no shots were fired, said Robert Dine, the police chief in suburban Greenwood, where the gun store was robbed.

"He had been beaten up by a gang. He said what he did was justified," Dine said. "His goal was to steal these and to kill everybody else that had beaten him up."

Clerk Steven Stapleton was shot five times in the robbery. Thirty-five weapons were taken, including 28 handguns and four assault rifles.

Police continue to look for the stolen guns.

California governor signs bill making city secession easier

SACRAMENTO, Calif. — Some residents of Los Angeles' sprawling San Fernando Valley want to secede from the rest of the city, and the governor has signed a bill that makes their dream a step closer.

The measure Gov. Pete Wilson signed into law Sunday repeals a 1977 law that gave city councils in California veto power over petitions submitted by people who wanted areas of their city to secede.

Supporters said a petition drive would begin right away, though they admit separating the San Fernando Valley and its 1 million population from the nation's second largest city is still a long way off.

Secession supporters say valley residents don't get enough services from the giant city, but opponents, chiefly from Los Angeles' urban core, said the bill would harm low-income areas and lead to attempts to jettison poor people from communities.

Man sentenced to 1,325 years; he claims to be victim of drugs

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — A man accused of victimizing three young men he befriended has been sentenced to 1,325 years in prison on 11 counts of sodomy and five counts of robbery.

The accused, age 35, was convicted last summer for the crimes between December 1995 and May 1996. His three victims were men who ranged in age from 18 to 22.

His sentence was 275 years longer than the sentence requested by Ted Hunt, assistant county prosecutor.

"Society has had it with the actions of sexual predators," Hunt said.

The accused, who asked the judge to give him no more than 10 years, blamed any improper actions on drugs, although he did not admit guilt.

"I'm a victim, too," he said. "If I wasn't doing drugs, I wouldn't be standing here."

Death toll hits 25, thousands injured in Bangladesh tornado

TONGI, Bangladesh — A tornado tore through a 3-square-mile area of Bangladesh, killing 25 Islamic preachers at a riverbank prayer meeting, rescue workers said. Another 5,000 people were reported injured.

The tornado stayed on the ground for a full half-hour on Sunday, blowing away tin roofs, trees and electricity poles near Tongi, an industrial town 10 miles north of Dhaka, the capital city.

Rescue workers at the scene said 25 people were killed and 5,000 injured, with all the dead being clerics.

Torn pieces of metal, iron rods, wood, cooking utensils, shoes and water pots littered the muddy field where the clerics had gathered.

They were elderly members of the World Congregation of Muslim Devotees and had assembled on the banks of the Turag River for a five-day seminar to study Islam.

Hispanic Heritage Month celebrates culture, friendship

MATT KREPS
staff writer

October is Hispanic Heritage Month at K-State. This year's theme is "Celebrando Nuestro Pasado, Construyendo Nuestro Futuro," which means "Celebrating Our Past, Building Our Future."

The month of events and celebrations is sponsored by the Hispanic American Leadership Organization. The organization is a group of Hispanic students who meet for friendship, fun and education.

"It acts as a sort of home away from home, a place to go to on Tuesday nights where Robert's Rules aren't in effect," said Doug Benson, one of the group's advisers.

Benson said speakers tell about financial aid and other university services students might not know about.

Hispanic Heritage Month helps the group and the university, said Lori Navarrete, also a HALO adviser. The events during the month highlight Hispanic awareness for the university and help students develop their cultural identity.

"It allows a forum for us to discuss our Hispanic identity," Navarrete said.

The month's activities range from movies to poetry to dances.

Victor Morales, a high-school teacher from Texas who campaigned for the U.S. Senate in 1996, will also speak about the future of Hispanic culture in America. His speech, "Building Our Future," will be at 3:30 p.m., Oct. 24 in Forum Hall.

A Spanish literature discussion and poetry reading will take place in the Flint Hills Room from 6:30 to 9 tonight. On Oct. 23, artist Joey Rocha will exhibit a display titled "Familia Art." The movies "Selena," "Evita" and "Fools Rush In" will be shown in the Little Theatre during the month.

More than 30 K-Staters attended the U.S. Hispanic Leadership Conference in Chicago Thursday - Sunday as part of the celebration.

Benson said the group was the largest K-State had ever sent to the conference.

"Before, I don't think we had ever sent more than 21," he said.

The International Student Center will present Latin American Cultural Night from 6:30 to 9 on Friday. Admission is a covered dish for the potluck supper. The grand finale will be the Gran Baile on Oct. 25 in the Landon Room at the Ramada Plaza. The dance starts at 9 p.m. Benson said HALO expects more than 100 people to attend.

"I think the most important thing is that it gets students who share a common cultural background together but in the context of K-State," Benson said.

Division of Biology dedicates classroom

JULIE LINDAMOOD
staff reporter

The shiny new computers and freshly painted classroom weren't the only reason for celebration Thursday afternoon in Ackert Hall. The Division of Biology also celebrated the dedication of the new Principles of Biology class.

"We're celebrating a three-year effort to bring positive, proactive change to our principles teaching and learning enterprise," said Brian Spooner, director of the biology division .

Three years ago, a committee was formed to look into finding a new way to teach Principles of Biology. By fall 1995, the committee decided on a multimedia approach and in fall 1996, Mark Decker was hired as the Principles of Biology course coordinator.

Decker said he was excited about the job because it was exactly what he wanted to do. He was also interested in making the course more interactive between faculty and students, and giving students the ability to access information after class sessions are over.

"One of the main focuses of the course as it's being structured is making this information available outside of the classroom," Decker said.

Students can access course information from their homes or computer labs to study class topics once their class time is over, Decker added.

The new classroom, in Ackert 219, and the restructured course will mean many things to K-State students, President Jon Wefald said.

"To redo this Principles of Biology course using this classroom as a means to an end will make sure that the students who take Principles of Biology have learned as much about biology as they could from any course taught, from Harvard to the University of California-Berkeley," Wefald said.

The classroom will help K-State students every year gain a better understanding of biology, Provost James Coffman said.

"Two thousand students a year are going to gain from the outcome of this effort, year after year," Coffman said. "What better payoff could we have?"

ACLU is open to discuss students civil rights, liberties

ASHLEY YOULE

A recent addition to the K-State campus, the American Civil Liberties Union student organization, is here to help educate students about their civil rights and liberties.

The K-State chapter, established about two years ago, is trying to get off the ground, Kelly Elliott, senior in history and pre-law and president of the ACLU, said.

"A lot of people have heard about the group, but they don't know what it is," she said. "We would like to make people more aware of how issues can affect their civil rights and liberties," she said.

The ACLU group is nationally active, with three other groups in Kansas and affiliates throughout the nation, Elliott said. It was just a matter of time and effort until a K-State chapter began, she said.

"About two years ago students approached me to see if we could get a student ACLU group started," John Fliter, professor of political science and adviser for the ACLU, said.

Since then, the group has focused on educating students by discussing civil liberty issues and questions they have about them, he said.

"Normally an ACLU organization is involved in litigation, but that's not the focus here," Fliter said.

At the monthly meetings, the ACLU group picks an issue in the news to discuss, such as the death penalty, or gay and lesbian rights,

Pedestrian issues need to be addressed before road expansion

Imagine Anderson Avenue as it is today — a four-lane traffic nightmare that makes left turns impossible and game days a living hell.

Now, imagine Anderson in the future, after a proposed widening between 16th Street and Sunset Avenue. Five, and in some places six, lanes wide, Anderson allows traffic to flow smoothly. Left- and right-hand turning lanes ease the strain on the once overburdened thoroughfare. Cars travel faster and the wait at stoplights is shorter.

Continue the mental picture.

Do you live south of campus? Do you walk to Aggieville? Crossing Anderson Avenue on foot won't be the same. The length of every crosswalk along the affected stretch of roadway will be increased.

For instance, at the Denison Avenue intersection, the 47-foot crosswalk would become a 93 1/2-foot journey. For football fans, that's more than 31 yards. Call Bill Snyder for strategy on how to get across.

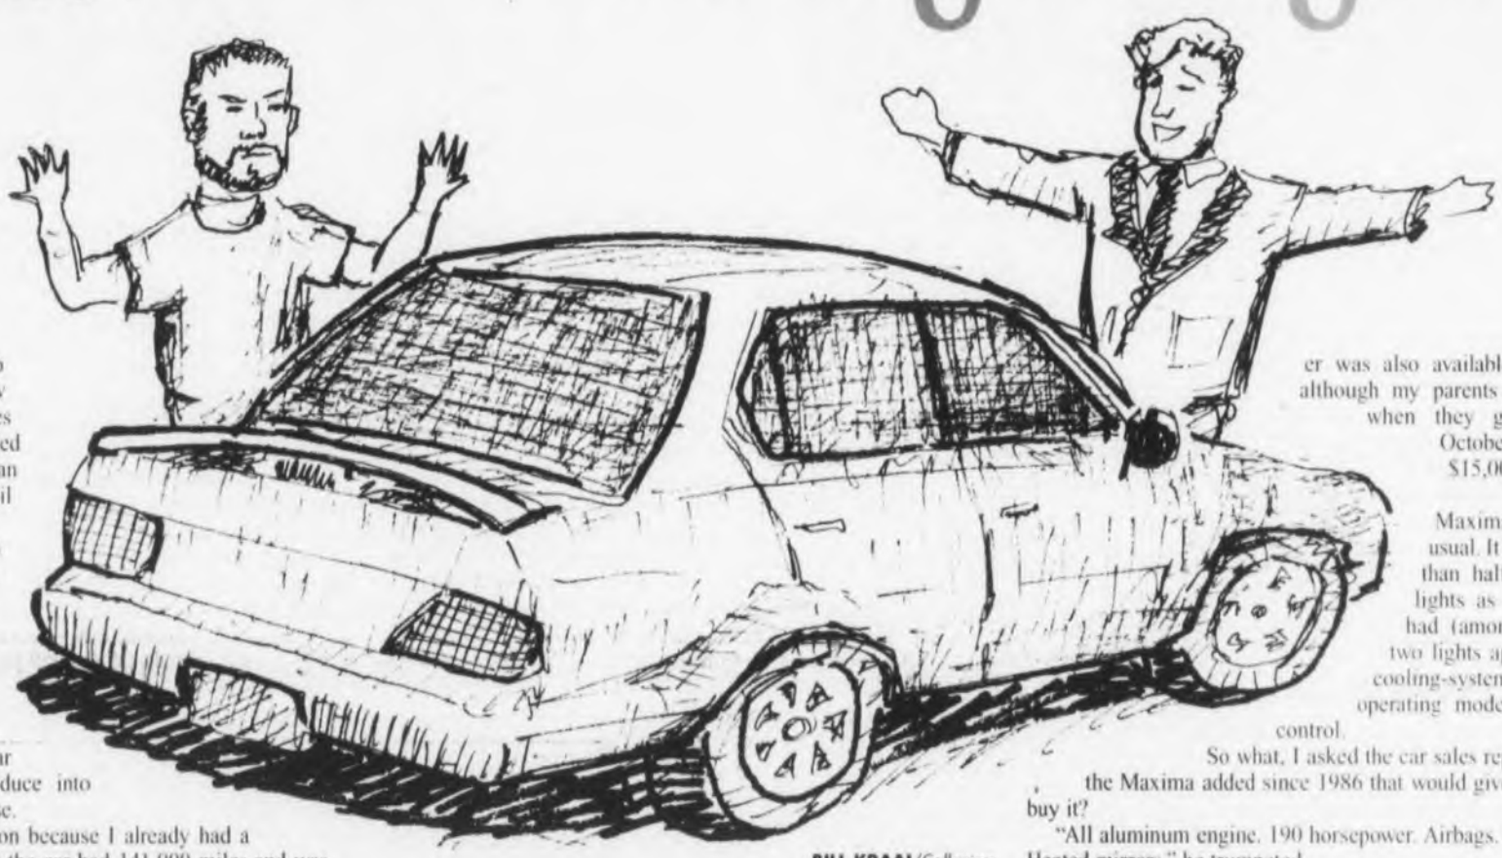
Not only would the length of crossings increase, but traffic signals also would be changed by the proposed construction.

Say goodbye to push-button signals that stop traffic for pedestrians. Say hello to traffic lights that are programmed to help speed traffic flow; they don't take pedestrians into account. You'll be waiting on the side of the street as cars whiz by.

And don't think the wait will be pleasing to the eye. It won't. City officials estimate 180 mature trees will be removed to make space for the wider road.

That's not all that's being sacrificed to make room for more lanes. The limestone retaining wall south of Nichols Hall? Gone. The intramural field south of Memorial Stadium? Gone. The landscaping south of the K-State Student Union? Gone as well.

Granted, the widening of Anderson Avenue is a necessary project. Providing for easier turns and better traffic flow is needed.



But city planners should stop the planning process now and address serious concerns about pedestrian safety and property along Anderson.

Otherwise, prepare for increased ambulance traffic along Anderson, as well — when pedestrians who couldn't stand the wait or couldn't beat the clock are run down in the name of progress.

"Hey, if you're going to pay $30K for a new car, let a shop do it," the car sales representative said as I peered under the hood of a 1998 Nissan Maxima, searching for the oil filter.

Of course I had no intention of buying a new car — let alone one costing $30,000 — but I had made the mistake of saying this as soon as I walked onto the showroom floor. Car dealers everywhere believe that customers who deny interest in buying a new car are usually the easiest to seduce into doing that very thing on impulse.

I was proof against seduction because I already had a 1986 Maxima and liked it. But the car had 141,000 miles and was going through one of those periodic spells where it seemed as if it wouldn't be happy unless it had a tuneup, including a complete spark plug and filter change, and maybe a can or two of carburetor cleaner sprayed down its throat.

This time it was squeaking, too, usually a sign that the brake pads (then 100,000 miles old on front and 60,000 miles on rear) need replacement. The electrical system was also trying to tell me the generator wasn't really up to its job and would fail in another 10,000 miles. It was one of those rough times in the marriage between man and car.

But any adulterous leanings I might have had were instantly squelched by the sight of the latest iteration of the Maxima. It wasn't sticker shock that did it. I was instantly struck by how few features it had, even in the top-of-the-line $30,000 trim level. Equipment I had in my 1986 car had vanished totally without a trace.

Cornering lamps, which I use to avoid driving into curbs when I take corners at high speed in the dark, were simply not there. The same was also true of keypads on the door and illuminated entry. I prefer the keypad to a remote entry system because it doesn't send funny little infrared signals to the car that can be picked up by a miscreant lurking nearby with a detector. I use the illuminated entry — which turns on the inside light when the door handle is pulled, even if the car is locked — to make sure the said miscreant isn't lurking inside the car.

The instrumentation was also bad. In 1986, the Maxima had oil pressure and voltage gauges in addition to the usual speedometer, tachometer and fuel- and coolant-temperature gauges. A trip computer was also available as an option, although my parents gave it a miss when they got my car in October 1985 (for only $15,000!).

For 1998, the Maxima has only the usual. It also has no more than half as many idiot lights as in 1986, which had (among other things) two lights apiece to indicate cooling-system problems and operating modes of the cruise control.

So what, I asked the car sales representative, had the Maxima added since 1986 that would give me a reason to buy it?

"All aluminum engine. 190 horsepower. Airbags. Antilock brakes. Heated mirrors," he trumpeted.

"OK," I said. My 1986 car got only 152 horsepower out of a cast-iron block with aluminum heads. But this thing (kicking the tires of the 1998 Maxima) is bigger, is harder to park, weighs more, gets worse gas mileage and requires premium fuel.

"Hey, you got to give up something to be part of the 21st century," he replied with a shrug.

I don't know about the rest of you Maxima owners out there, but I took my 1986 model with its aircraft cockpit and its oil filter, I can still find and reach from above, and remained firmly planted in the 20th century.

It is the only reminder I have of an age when a thousand dollars was serious money that meant three zeroes, rather than a "K," and you got value when you bought a car.

CONJECTURED SCANDALS OVERSHADOW PRESIDENT CLINTON'S ACCOMPLISHMENTS

BOYD FERRIS

BOYD FERRIS is a senior in electrical engineering. You can send e-mail to Boyd at ferris@ksu.edu.

It has been said that a politician's job is the second-oldest profession, bearing close resemblance to the first — they're always getting screwed over.

President Clinton probably knows this the most. He is one of the best presidents our nation has ever elected, but all people want to do is talk about pointless, trivial, fallacious scandals, continually ignoring his accomplishments.

One of his greatest accomplishments is the economy, which has prospered ever since he took office. During his first three years, 8.4 million jobs were created while controlling inflation. We have the lowest combined rate of unemployment and inflation in 27 years.

Clinton has also reduced government costs. He has cut more than $255 billion in government spending, and he passed the largest deficit-cutting plan in history, which will save more than $1 trillion over seven years.

Clinton has done what most Republican politicians only dreamed about — cutting government bureaucracy. He eliminated 284 federal advisory committees and 215,000 federal work-force positions, and he abolished 16,000 pages of regulations.

He has several accomplishments in strengthening the family. He passed the Family and Medical Leave Act and welfare reform. Since taking office, he has reduced welfare caseloads by 5 percent, representing 700,000 fewer recipients of welfare each month.

These are only a few examples. President Clinton has accomplished an enormous amount for our nation. He has signed a lot of legislation — Student Loan Reform Act, School-to-Work Opportunities Act, Telecommunications Bill, Crime Bill, the North American Free Trade Agreement and Community Reinvestment Act.

KRIS EMMONS/Collegian

*ARTIST'S NOTE - TODAY IS MY BROTHER BRIAN'S 20TH BIRTHDAY! HAVE A GREAT ONE "B"!

Partisan politics are the main reason why most people disregard President Clinton's accomplishments. Republicans have a hard time accepting the fact that there is finally a good Democratic president.

I ask a lot of my conservative friends to give reasons they don't like Clinton. Most of them just shrug their shoulders, saying that they really can't give any reasons. Some of them mention he has a poor character, supporting their claim with conjectural scandals hyped up by the media. What ever happened to being innocent until proven guilty?

Republicans and Democrats are born to hate each other, and they mutually seek out each other's destruction. The only thing Republicans can do to try to bring down Clinton is to encourage the press to report on possible presidential scandals.

As you all probably know, Clinton has never been found guilty of any scandal. However, people still associate him with scandals, which overshadow his accomplishments.

Conservatives tried their hardest to discredit President Clinton with the Whitewater scandal. After several years of trying to dig up dirt, they found nothing. Clinton never did anything wrong.

Some ultra-conservative magazines tried to conjecture a scandal with Vincent Foster's suicide, indicating some type of White House foul play. How ridiculous. These people are so full of it they need an enema.

The scandal in the news now is Clinton being accused of sexual harassment I think that I speak for all slackers when I say, who the hell cares?

As usual, President Clinton will be found innocent, because he did nothing wrong. Unfortunately, the conservative dirty trick tactics are working. People will get a scandalous image of President Clinton.

How can anyone not consider President Clinton to be of the best presidents? He greatly improved the economy, decreased government spending, reduced bureaucracy and size of the government. He has pushed through and signed more of the Republican platform than any of his predecessors, so why can't conservatives accept him as a great president?

Reader praises lack of censorship

Editor,

I am writing to thank the Collegian for printing articles on religion and other topics that seem to bother people so much these days.

Thank you for not listening to those wishing to censor the very ideas our Constitution was designed to protect, religious or otherwise.

Thank you for printing the letters of those demanding that you stop printing opinions, no matter how much I happen to disagree with them. I wonder how they would feel if their attempts at censorship were successful.

Karl Kramer's letter on Monday should have never been published, under the policy that he promoted censorship of religious topics. It is, after all, an opinion on religion to state that it should be censored. Or did Kramer intend only to censor opinions promoting religion?

We must tolerate topics in the Collegian that we do not agree with, in order to protect our right to present our own opinions in those same pages. I can remember a time when the Collegian seemed to print a large number of anti-Christian and atheist columns. And I can remember a few Christians writing to the editor to demand the censorship of those columns.

So now, religious "zealots" of all kinds are writing the columns promoting their religious opinions. It's a good thing the Collegian didn't take their advice before, when they claimed the pages of the Collegian were not the place for, anti-religious debate. And it's a good thing that the Collegian isn't taking the advice of Kramer and others who have written in lately, demanding religious columns stop.

If you find these columns to be so misguided and wrong, then write in and argue against the points they present. Show us why you are right and they are wrong. That is why we have the First Amendment, to protect the free debate of opinions. Don't demand they cease to express their opinions when it's their Constitutional right to do so.

Keep in mind that the day the Collegian listens to you and censors all columns and news on religion, your opinion will cease to be heard, because your opinion is on the subject of religion.

Homecoming week offers plethora of activities

ASHLEY YOULE
staff reporter

The K-State campus is fired up and ready for Homecoming this year. Each day this week the campus will have an activity planned for all students to participate in, from chanting at a bonfire to playing football at Memorial Stadium.

"We wanted to try something new this year," Heather Lansdowne, assistant director of alumni programs, said. "We wanted one activity every day that was open to the public and to every student."

In addition to the annual greek and residence hall competitions, students can participate in the new activities sponsored by the K-State Student Union, the residence halls and Student Alumni Board, Lansdowne said.

Tuesday, students are encouraged to wear their purple for Purple Pride Day to show their support for K-State, she said.

Wednesday, K-State ambassador elections will be in the Union from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. Also, Student Alumni Board is putting on K-State's first punt, pass and kick event which, will take place at Memorial Stadium.

"We're excited about this new activity," Lansdowne said. "All students can come and compete for some great prizes."

The greek and residence hall body building competition begins at 6:30 p.m. Wednesday in Ahearn Field House.

Thursday is Purple Prizes Day, and students can register at the Union to win K-State prizes.

"These different groups have done a good job reaching out to more people to have activities that interest a greater number of students," Amy Button Renz, president of the KSU Alumni Association, said.

Students can also continue voting for ambassadors in the Union.

Friday is the last day for ambassador elections until 4 p.m. in the Union. Float judging will be from 2:30 to 5:30 p.m. The body building finals will be at 5:30 p.m. in Ahearn, followed by a pep rally and bonfire at Memorial Stadium, Lansdowne said.

"The bonfire is a good idea," Krista Joy, senior in marketing, said. "We haven't had it in the three years I've been here, and I think it's a great addition to the Homecoming activities."

On Saturday, the Homecoming parade will begin at 9 a.m. and will go through Aggieville and downtown Manhattan. After the parade, the Wildcats will kick off the football game at 2:30 p.m. The overall Homecoming winners and the 1997 K-State ambassadors will be announced at halftime, Lansdowne said.

"It seems like there's more activities this year than there have been in the past," Joy said.

Activities such as the punt, pass and kick competition are new to the campus this year in an attempt to increase visibility and participation with all students, Lansdowne said.

"All of these activities are a fun way to get different groups together for Homecoming," Joy said. "The main focus of Homecoming should be to unite them and their spirit for K-State."

Enrollment for continuing education begins

CATHY BACH
staff reporter

Enrollment for continuing education classes offered at Fort Riley began Monday for K-State students and civilians. Enrollment times are 8 a.m to 6 p.m. in room 131 at the Division of Continuing Education in College Court and from 7:30 a.m to 4:30 p.m. in room 206 at Fort Riley Building 217 on the main post.

The costs of these classes are $88 per credit hour. Students who need financial aid can contact their financial aid adviser to apply for guaranteed and emergency student loans.

Classes start on Monday and end Dec. 13. They are offered to members of the military and their dependents. Any remaining spots are open to college students and civilians.

Joan Colahan, office assistant at the Division of Continuing Education, said enrollment is first-come, first-served.

"Lots of times, students are standing outside the door waiting to enroll," Colahan said.

Colahan said enrollment must be done in person, and classes usually fill up fast. She said requirements for enrolling are payment and signatures.

Ruth Stanley, coordinator and adviser for the Fort Riley Continuing Education program, said the classes have more adults than traditional-age students, and the typical class size is 25.

"In the past, it was typical for K-State students to take these classes because of financial aid," Stanley said. "They needed to have a three-hour course to qualify for financial aid."

Stanley said another reason students take Fort Riley classes is a typical three-hour class meets twice weekly for three hours and is over in eight weeks.

Lynn Ryan, former K-State student, said sometimes Fort Riley classes are more convenient than classes offered on campus.

"Lots of times these classes just seem to fit into my schedule better," Ryan said. "They're over quicker and don't last a whole semester."

Colahan said the deadline for enrolling in classes is after the second class meeting, and a $25 late fee is charged for students enrolling late. Students who enroll after the first class meeting must also receive instructor's permission.

Stanley said 41 undergraduate-level courses will be offered, which include accounting, biology, computers, economics, English, geography, geology, history, math, music, political science, psychology, sociology, speech, statistics and women's studies.

Courses will apply to students earning degrees from K-State.

Baby Jessica's family avoids hype of anniversary

ASSOCIATED PRESS

MIDLAND, Texas — Ten years ago this week, little Jessica McClure was rescued from an abandoned well in a drama that brought out some of the best and the worst in human nature.

Today, she is an 11-year-old who makes A's and B's at school, plays the piano and French horn and whizzes through her neighborhood on skates. The sixth-grader is said to have no memory at all of the 58-hour ordeal.

"More than anything, I want her to have a normal childhood," said Cissy Porter, who was 18 when her daughter plunged down the 22-foot hole. "We want everyone to know that she's fine, that she's a healthy, active, loving girl. But we don't want people recognizing her everywhere she goes."

The girl's divorced parents, Cissy Porter and Chip McClure, seem eager to let the anniversary pass quietly, granting just one interview, to Ladies Home Journal. Shunning attention, too, are many of the rescuers in this oilfield city who have been linked ever since to the wide-eyed toddler.

Jessica told the magazine she likes Beanie Babies and animals, and has nine dogs and cats. She's bored by talk of the incident, which claimed her right little toe and left some minor scars from skin grafts.

"I'm proud of them," she said of the scars. "I have them because I survived."

The nightmares that plagued her early childhood are long gone.

"She doesn't remember any of it," said Midland police Sgt. Andy Glasscock, who was a fixture at the scene. "About the only thing she remembers is what people tell her and what she sees on the news."

A poll taken by The Pew Research Center for the People and the Press measuring coverage of Princess Diana's death found that in the past decade, only Jessica's rescue rivaled the Paris car accident in worldwide attention. Not everyone understands the fuss.

"This was just a one-child disaster," said former Midland Fire Chief James Roberts. "As we speak, somewhere in the United States an 18-month-old baby is in trouble, and the fire department is on the scene trying to save her life."

Ten years ago, Chip and Cissy McClure were poor teen-agers struggling to make ends meet during the depths of the oil bust. While visiting her sister, Cissy McClure left Jessica in the yard while she went to answer the phone. Moments later, Jessica happened upon an 8-inch hole and innocently touched off a global event.

Rescue crews and citizen volunteers united to dig a shaft parallel to the one that trapped Jessica. A layer of superhard rock complicated the operation.

"I don't think I ever drilled through anything harder than that," said driller Charles Boler. "You could hear her crying as we got closer. That's what kept me going because I had a 2-year-old child at the time and I could identify with the family."

On Oct. 16, 1987, paramedics Steve Forbes and Robert O'Donnell wriggled into the passageway, slathered a frightened Jessica with petroleum jelly and slid her out into the bright television lights.

Afterward, sympathetic strangers from around the world who had watched Jessica's drama inundated her with teddy bears, homemade gifts, cards and cash.

The money, estimated at $1 million or more, sits in a trust fund waiting for her to turn 25. The McClures were criticized for quickly spending at least $80,000. Much of it went toward a failed business. They divorced in 1990.

Now that the oilfields are bustling again, Midland has reclaimed its status in Texas as a petroleum hotbed. Outside the state, though, Jessica still represents this city of nearly 100,000.

"No matter where I go, someone asks me if that's where the little girl was in the well," retired Police Chief Richard Czech said.

STORY BY JESS C. LOUK

CEPHUS SCOTT and Mark Simoneau of K-State tackle Missouri running back Ernest Blackwell. K-State's defense manhandled the Missouri Tigers on Saturday, allowing the Tigers to score only 11 points.

IVAN KOZAR Collegian

K-State's quarterback wasn't the only big show Saturday against Missouri. The defense kept an option-oriented Tiger team to just minimal yards on the ground.

TOUGH D

Everyone knows by now that quarterback Michael Bishop ran all over the Missouri Tigers on Saturday afternoon in K-State's 41-11 win at KSU Stadium, but don't be so quick to forget about the defensive side of the ball.

While the Tiger defense was diving, stumbling, missing tackles and grabbing at air in an effort to corral Bishop, the Cats' defense was keeping the Tiger offense out of the end zone for more than three-fourths of the game.

On Bishop's 38-yard run to the 1-yard line in the second quarter, a Tiger missed Bishop in the backfield, another missed him as he broke across the line of scrimmage and a final defender jumped at air and bounced off the turf as Bishop was finally dragged down by a fourth defender at the 1-yard line.

"Our tackling stunk as bad as our blocking," Missouri coach Larry Smith said. "I bet our blocking graded out less than 50 percent."

While the Missouri tackling was above par, the Cats' defense kept Missouri out of the end-zone until the fourth quarter. Eight of Missouri's 11 points came late in the fourth quarter, after the game was well out of reach. Before the Tigers scored again, K-State was up 41-3.

On Missouri's only first-half scoring drive, the Tigers were kept out of the end zone on three consecutive goal-to-go-plays. The Tigers were forced to kick a 19-yard field goal.

"We played well enough with our number ones," Coach Bill Snyder said. "We had a little difficulty with Corby (Jones) on the option, and we struggled with the passing game."

Jones attempted 16 passes in the game and completed seven for 138 yards. When he ran the ball, Jones gained 84 yards in 23 attempts. He only had one gain of more than 20 yards, which was negated by a 26-yard loss.

"He didn't have 100-percent speed," Smith said. "He was slow because people from the other team were all over him."

This wasn't the first year the K-State defense shut down the Tiger offense. Last season when the Cats and Tigers met, the Tigers were only able to muster 10 points with their offense.

But wait, it gets worse for the Tigers. In the Volleyball team climbs back into conference race

In the first four matches of Big 12 Conferences play, the K-State volleyball team struggled, losing three times and falling toward the bottom of the standings.

But the Wildcats, along with other teams in the Big 12, came up with big victories in week three and showed that the conference title is still up for grabs.

Friday night, the Cats recovered from a five-game loss against Oklahoma last weekend to down Baylor 3-0.

The Cats came out firing against the Bears, jumping out to a 7-0 lead in the first game and allowing only one sideout in the process. K-State had a game one hitting percentage of .300, while Baylor hit only .105. The Cats withstood a four-point Bears' rally to take the game 15-8.

"We knew we had to jump right out on them at the first," said freshman middle blocker Kelle Branting. "We had a good week of practice, so we really came out and took advantage of their mistakes."

Game two was a bit more difficult for the Cats. They scored three consecutive points to make the score 14-7, but Baylor battled back to 14-11 before the Cats got the final point of the game.

The third game was close for a while. The Cats were down 6-4 until they put together an 11-3 run to finish out the match.

K-State was led by Branting, who hit .481 for the match and had 15 kills. During games two and three, she hit .650 and had no hitting errors.

"I thought Kelle Branting did a really good job today of stepping it up," said senior setter Devon Ryning. "(She has matured) very much. I think she's gone through some really hard times, but I think she's slowly progressing, and she did very well tonight."

This week, it was K-State's time to step up. Baylor entered Friday's match with a 12-6 record, while Texas Tech came to Manhattan at 16-3. But neither team threatened the Cats, who finally started playing the type of volleyball Coach Jim McLaughlin expected them to play.

McLaughlin said K-State played its "best match of the year, no doubt about it," against the Red Raiders.

The Cats beat Texas Tech 15-8, 15-10, 12-

Intramurals now in indoor season

MICHAEL RYAN
staff reporter

With flag football wrapping up and winter weather on the way, the indoor season has arrived for K-State intramurals.

Volleyball is the next big team sport, and singles competitions lead the other events. The singles competitions include four-wall handball, four-wall racquetball, squash, table tennis and h-o-r-s-e.

Faculty and staff will have their own co-rec volleyball division and students will have their usual divisions of men, women and co-rec.

Individuals or teams wishing to participate must go to the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex and sign up at the Recreational Services administrative office by 5 p.m. Thursday.

All team captains and managers have their second meeting of the year at 5 p.m. next Tuesday in Forum Hall.

In other intramural news, the golf tournament for fraternities that was scheduled for Sunday was canceled because of rain. A handful of students tried to fight the wind and rain on Sunday, but none of the groups finished more than eight holes.

Ron Miller, assistant director of intramurals, said it is doubtful whether the tournament will be made up because of the difficulty of scheduling the use of Rolling Meadows Golf Course.

The rain-out of the first tournament will not affect participants who signed up for the Sunday golf tournament, Miller said. The Sunday tournament will be played at Rolling Meadows.

There are only five more intramural events left after the deadline Thursday.

A cross country meet, inner tube water polo, bowling, a sports trivia contest and a three-point contest will finish out the fall semester. Deadlines for the cross country meet and inner tube water polo are Oct. 23.

THE K-STATE ROUNDUP

COMPILED BY SUN DEE MILLS

K-State assistant men's basketball coach resigns

Wildcat assistant men's basketball coach Bob Hanson resigned Monday to accept a job as the director of the Wichita Sports Commission.

Hanson

Hanson has been a part of the Cats' basketball program since 1994. He began the 1994 season as the director of basketball operations, a job in which he attended to the daily administrative functions of the men's team. He was an assistant coach during the 1995-96 school year.

Cat Coach Tom Asbury played for Hanson at the University of Wyoming in 1963, during Asbury's freshman year. Hanson was the head freshman coach that year and was Wyoming's assistant coach while Asbury played on the varsity team from 1965 through 1966.

Hanson has been active with the National Association of Basketball Coaches since 1969. Last April at the annual convention during the Final Four in Indianapolis, he finished his duties as president of the NABC.

During March Madness last season, Hanson won two national awards. At the National Invitational Tournament in New York, he was honored for his contribution to college basketball. At the Final Four, Hanson received the Dalton S. Hilliard Award for his work in the field.

K-State players rack up national football honors

The 41-11 blowout the Wildcats delivered to Missouri on Saturday earned conference and national honors for two players.

Simoneau

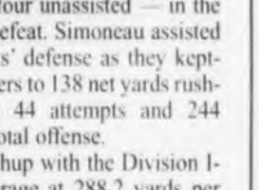
Sophomore linebacker Mark Simoneau, last season's Big 12 Freshman Defensive Player of the year, was named this week's Big 12 Defensive Player of the Week.

Simoneau recorded 13 tackles — four unassisted — in the Tiger defeat. Simoneau assisted the Cats' defense as they kept the Tigers to 138 net yards rushing on 44 attempts and 244 yards total offense.

Missouri entered the matchup with the Division I-A's sixth-highest rushing average at 288.2 yards per game.

"Missouri is a good football team," Simoneau said after Saturday's game. "To hold them to one field goal in the first half maybe took the wind out of their sails a little bit."

Garcia



AT&T's Long Distance punt award in Division I-A football went to junior punter James Garcia. Garcia averaged 61.5 yards in Saturday's game and booted a career-long 76 yard punt in the third quarter. A 47-yard punt into the wind garnered Garcia the high game average.

After 21 punts this season, Garcia has a 44.6-yard average. He is the Cats' all-time career punting leader and ended the 1996 season third in the Big 12 and 15th in the country.

Chiefs record not as swell as it seems

Yes, the Chiefs' 4-2 record is much better than many people expected going into the season.

VIEWPOINT

DENNIS EVANS

DENNIS EVANS sports reporter at KMBC-9 News in Kansas City, Mo. Dennis can be reached at 816-221-999 or at www.kmbc.com

But don't let the numbers fool you. Things out at Arrowhead Stadium aren't nearly as peachy as they seem.

I realize that "almost" is only supposed to count in horseshoes and hand grenades, and many Chiefs fans are not concerned about the fact that this team could easily be 1-5 right now. But they should be.

Give Chiefs' head coach Marty Schottenheimer some credit, though. If the Coach-of-the-Year award were handed out after week six of the season, Marty would win unanimously.

But if his job depended upon the second half of the year, Marty would likely be sitting next to Dick Enberg in a broadcast booth criticizing plays instead of calling them.

The numbers back me up. The Chiefs began the 1995 season 4-1 and finished the year at 13-3. A great record, but a horrible finish when an early playoff exit put a black eye on the best regular-season record in team history.

In 1996, the Chiefs once again hopped out to a 4-1 start before things fell apart. The team lost four of its past five games and failed to make the playoffs for the first time in the 1990s.

Do you notice a pattern here?

For the first time in years, the Chiefs finally have the talent to finish a season strong.

The question is, do they have the chemistry?

Wide receiver Brett Perriman was waived last week, a Student organization supports life

LORI GUILFOYLE
staff reporter

Active participation and strong beliefs characterize members of the KSU Students for the Right to Life organization.

"It's something I can do willingly and know in my heart what I'm doing is right," said Laura Ziegler, junior in family life and community service and president of the K-State chapter.

More info? Contact the Students for the Right to Life by calling Laura Ziegler at 776-9846.

Robert Trausch, junior in civil engineering and vice president of the organization, said he became involved when he met friends that were part of the group. He also said his involvement is due to his upbringing. He is from a big family that has a strong pro-life belief.

The group recently participated in the National Life Chain, which was Oct. 5. Organizations all over the United States and Canada lined the streets of their communities with signs to protest abortion.

"It is a prayerful, peaceful protest against abortion," Ziegler said.

Trausch said the purpose of the chain was to get others to question their own beliefs.

"It really made people think about the abortion issue. We acted as silent witnesses," Trausch said.

People would look at them, read the sign and their faces would go blank. Some people express agreement, others disagree. Those people that remained emotionless are the ones that worry him the most, he said.

"If you take a stand, you are more likely to fight for what you believe."

There are about100 members signed up for the Students for the Right to Life organization, but only 20 to 30 active participants, Ziegler said. It began as a private organization but has been registered with Students' Activities Council for the past five or six years. Trausch said the group's stand is solid in its view on abortion.

"For all life in general, life should be preserved from the time of fertilization to death. We believe that the fundamental right to life should be granted to everyone," he said.

Ziegler said it is up to the member to decide how involved he or she is in the organization. Meetings are every two weeks and include some kind of activity or educational video. Other activities the group is involved with include: volunteering at local crisis pregnancy centers, adopting a family during the holidays and participating in fund-raisers.

In the spring, the group will participate in Life Awareness Week. A Committee to submit bill creating reserves account

CATHY BACH
staff reporter

The Allocations committee will submit a bill to Student Senate on Thursday to create a reserves fund for unused money from this semester's academic competition teams.

Gabe Eckert, committee chair, said this is one of the few times, if not the only time, in committee history that it has money left after funding the teams.

Last year, the committee had $16,000 to fund the academic competition teams, Eckert said. This year it has $28,000.

The agricultural academic competition teams requested $17,000, Speech Unlimited requested $8,950 and the Business Case teams requested $1,590. The money by Senate allocations to these teams is used for travel, food and lodging when the teams go to regional and national competitions.

The $12,000 increase enabled it to fund each team the total amounts requested and left the committee $460, Eckert said.

The Allocations Committee will request that this money be put into a reserves fund for use by the competition teams if emergency funding is needed. To use this money, the teams will need a two-thirds vote from Senate, Eckert said. Any funds unused by the teams during the term will be channeled back into the reserves account.

Eckert said there will be requirements for use of the money. Teams may request reserves if there is a significant difference between the amount needed and the amount allocated or if they are unexpectedly invited to a national competition. If new competition teams are created between funding periods, Senate can use the reserves to fund them.

Splitting up excess money by a percentage of each team's total budget or team membership were two other options discussed, but the committee decided a reserve fund would be the best option.

"We feel this is the most fiscally responsible move we can make," Eckert said. "It will help us prepare for the future and what we do each semester."

Justin Knopf, committee vice chair, said in the past, the decision to allocate funds was difficult. He said it was easier this year because there was more money than requested.

"Last year, the decision was based more on mathematical or value judgments," Knopf said.

Carlton Getz, committee member, said the increase should not raise the expectations of groups for future funding.

"This is not a green light to over-request for next year," Getz said.

Knopf said representatives of the teams told the committee the amount requested for fall would be the same amount requested in the spring.

"The budget money is set for right now," he said.

Panhellenic prepares for Homecoming

COLE EHMKE
staff reporter

Finalizing Homecoming plans and involving more people in the festivities were the focus of the Panhellenic Council's meeting Monday.

"We're hoping to attract a lot of people," Jami Nelson, Homecoming coordinator for Panhellenic Council, said.

Nelson said Homecoming is focusing on the community aspect as well as student groups.

As part of the community involvement, admission to the body building preliminaries is a nonperishable food item or canned good, which will be given to the Flint Hills Breadbasket.

Greeks also volunteered for another competition, Paint It Purple, for six Saturdays before Homecoming to do community service.

Volunteers did everything from spread wood chips at Kanopolis State Park to put up posters for the Regional Prevention Center. The activity began two years ago to bring a community service side to Homecoming.

Pamphlets at local hotels advertising the week will attract people who took advantage of incentive plans to come early, Nelson said.

During Homecoming Week, contests for student groups include a body building contest, Pant the Chant, a banner contest in the Union Courtyard and a punt, pass and kick contest.

Plane crash kills John Denver; cause of accident undetermined

Denver

ASSOCIATED PRESS

PACIFIC GROVE, Calif. — John Denver, whose '70s hits such as "Rocky Mountain High" and "Take Me Home, Country Roads" gained him millions of fans worldwide, was killed when his experimental plane crashed into Monterey Bay. He was 53.

The identity of the body pulled from the waters after Sunday's crash was confirmed from fingerprints sent from Colorado, said Monterey County Sheriff Norman Hicks today. An autopsy was planned.

"He loved flying," Teri Martell, whose sister Annie was Denver's first wife, said earlier today. "He died doing something he loved."

As the sun rose over the crash site today, a Coast Guard helicopter circled overhead, appearing to look for more debris from the crash, and a Coast Guard ship floated over the site about 100 yards from shore.

The plane, which Denver owned, was made of fiberglass with a single engine and two seats. It was considered an experimental aircraft, said Pacific Grove police Lt. Carl Miller. It took off from Monterey Airport shortly after 5 p.m. Sunday, with the first reports of a crash at 5:27 p.m. Only Denver was aboard.

The plane was flying about 500 feet in the air "when it just sort of dropped unexpectedly into the ocean," Miller said. "When it hit the water it broke into numerous parts."

Witness Carolyn Pearl told KCBA-TV that she saw a puff and heard a popping sound before the crash. The plane "kind of went up a little bit and absolutely straight down, not spiraling, just absolutely straight down," she said. "I thought it was doing some kind of acrobatic move, or something, and then realized it wasn't."

"I saw it hit the water and then a big splash of water came up over it," said another witness, Linda Shuman. "There was debris everywhere and the birds were in a frenzy. There were pieces everywhere."

Denver, a licensed pilot, was in a previous plane accident in April 1989. He walked away uninjured after the 1931 biplane he was piloting spun around while taxiing at an airport in northern Arizona.

"We are all very broken up over this," said a family friend, Jerry McClain. "The person John was in public was the person he was personally."

John Denver was born Henry John Deutschendorf Jr., the son of a U.S. Air Force pilot, when his father was stationed at Roswell, N.M. He took his stage name from the premier city in Colorado, where he eventually made his home.

In the mid-'60s, he was chosen from 250 other hopefuls as lead singer for the Chad Mitchell Trio as a replacement for the departing Mitchell. But the trio's best years were behind it by then, and he left in 1969 for a solo career. That same year, his song "Leaving on a Jet Plane" became a big hit for the band Peter, Paul and Mary.

Soon, Denver's own records — melodic, light folk-pop with touches of country — began climbing the charts as well. He scored with songs like "Sunshine on My Shoulders," "Annie's Song" (written for his first wife), "Back Home Again" and "Thank God I'm a Country Boy." He wrote many of his hits; even when they were by other songwriters, he made them his own.

Fourteen of his albums went gold and eight were ranked as platinum, with more than a million units sold. The LP "John Denver's Greatest Hits" is still one of the largest selling albums in the history of RCA Records, with worldwide sales of more than 10 million copies. He was named Country Music Entertainer of the Year in 1975.

He has strong appeal to overseas audiences as well, with many gold and platinum records in other countries.

In 1985, he toured the U.S.S.R. in the first performances by an American artist since the suspension, at that time, of cultural exchanges between the United States and the former Soviet Union. He was the first artist from the West to do a multicity tour of mainland China, in October 1992, and similarly in Vietnam in May 1994.

"Music does bring people together," Denver once said. "It allows us to experience the same emotions. People everywhere are the same in heart and spirit. No matter what language we speak, what color we are, the form of our politics or the expression of our love and our faith, music proves we are the same."

In 1976, Denver co-founded the Windstar Foundation, a nonprofit environmental education and research center that works toward a sustainable future for the world.

He also was active in fighting world hunger and had an interest in space exploration.

He volunteered to go on a space shuttle, not as an entertainer but "as everyman, as a world citizen."

The explosion of the Challenger in 1986 and the death of the first U.S. civilian in space, teacher Christa McAuliffe, didn't deter his interest. After all, he said, "It's a risk to get up in the morning."

Variety is the spice of life

MELONY'S NEW ALBUM COVERS SPECTURM OF MUSICAL TASTES

MUSIC REVIEW

CORBIN H. CRABLE
staff writer

So what mood are you in? Do you feel on top of the world? Are you feeling kind of depressed? Maybe you're in love?

Melony's latest compact disc, "Satisfaction," truly lives up to its name. In "Satisfaction" this rising alternative band manages to cover an entire spectrum of moods in the variety of its songs.

The first track, "Wearing Shades on Rainy Days," treats the listener to upbeat vocals. Lead vocalist/guitarist Peter Kvint and backing vocals/drummer Mans Eriksson go into an a capella harmony toward the end of the track, which builds to a climactic ending.

Other tracks for the happy, go-lucky Melony fan include "Let's Make a Rainbow," "My Corona" (complete with the occasional repeated chord from the guitar) and "Stage Diver" (the name speaks for itself).

I must admit, though, that it was the more melancholy tracks that caught my attention. Although the tracks mentioned above make for dominant guitar solos and strong vocals, the more "depressing" tracks provide lyrics that really make the listener think "What the heck were they thinking when they wrote that one?"

The melancholy Melony tracks include "Tinsel Town Spinster," a song about growing old and dying alone (an obviously altogether pleasant thought); "2nd Man on the Moon," a song about the pain of living in the shadows of other people, in this case the song makes references to Neil Armstrong; and "Big Dipper," a typical teenage angst song … and what would an alternative band be without a good teenage angst song to make the blood boil? The lyrics in "Big Dipper" ("Gonna try to keep my head above the ground/when the city drags me down") are all about breaking away from society and going on to become a superstar.

Perhaps the most interesting song, which I cannot categorize as either happy and peppy nor sad and morose, is the song titled "Barbara Streisand Nose," a song about the unusual physical characteristics that might attract you to someone. In this case, it wasn't the Bette Davis eyes, it was that Barbara Streisand nose. Ol' Babs must be lovin' that one. Hey, admit it, you'd be honored too if Melony wrote a song about your nose.

"Satisfaction" ends with "November Blues," the song beginning with a slow, mellow tempo and Peter Kvint's whisper-like vocals. Eventually, Kvint's vocals become heavier as the theme of broken relationships becomes evident in the lyrics. Obviously, the CD ends on a note that almost anyone can relate to.

That is why Melony will appeal to everyone in search of variety. The vocals by Kvint and Eriksson, the wailing trumpet solo by Andreas Lowstedt and the ever-changing tempos will keep the listener in anticipation for what is to come on the next track.

Truly, Melony's "Satisfaction" is an album for all seasons … and all moods.

Quadrajets combine rock, blues; Mr. T Experience plays punk rock

Music Review

PHIL KELLUM
staff writer

The Quadrajets come out of the backwoods of Alabama to create one of the fiercest combinations of punk rock and blues music ever committed to vinyl.

The band also features the artist formerly known as Captain Zeno of Man or Astroman.

"Ain't Red No More" takes up the A side, and it's a scorcher. It's fast, raw, mean blues-punk in equal doses. It roars out of the speakers like a freight train and with as much ferocity.

I can't tell what the lyrics are, other than "Heartbreaker!" yowled over and over because of the overdriven roar of the guitars, bass and drums.

"Ain't Red No More" is a great A side for a single.

The double B side kicks off with a cover of Willie Dixon's "Hidden Charms."

They keep the blues intact, yet inject a ton of attitude.

On this song alone, The 'Jets thrash away harder on the instruments harder than most other bands do.

The last song, "Crawl," comes straight out of left field. I didn't expect this after hearing the first few tunes.

It is acoustic-based with an upright bass and sounds as if they got together with a bunch of their friends and started jamming on some porch in the middle of Alabama.

It's total blues, even more so than the other songs.

This is essential for anyone who likes aggressive music along the lines of The Humpers or New Bomb Turks.

Mr. T Experience
"... And I Will Always Be With You"
(Lookout! Records)

The kings of the punk-rock love song are back with another platter of, you guessed it, love songs.

The A side, and title track, is the first single from MTX's brand new "Revenge Is Sweet and So Are You" compact disc.

It's a very catchy pop-punk ditty about wanting to be with the one you love.

It's a song that is guaranteed to get you out of your seat and dance along.

The B side is just as great as the first side.

MTX is infamous for its choices of cover songs, so for this single, they cover "Don't Go Breaking My Heart" by Elton John.

Lead singer/guitarist Dr. Frank duets with Kim Shattuck of The Muffs and make it far better than the original.

They speed it up and turn it into a love anthem. It's a perfect match for MTX.

I love this version of "Don't Go Breaking My Heart." It's so good.

The last track, "You Alone," is simply fun. Yet again, it's a love tune.

The guitar parts on this one are really cool. They sound different than most pop-punk guitar riffs. The vocal harmonies are also untouchable.

Pick this one up if you are a fan of sappy punk rock.

Man has 'Wheel' fixation

LOS ANGELES — Raymond Taylor rode the "Wheel of Fortune" to the top, but it was his failure to go back down that caused him trouble.

The 46-year-old Los Angeles man became so infatuated with the TV game show after winning $81,000 in cash and prizes in 1993 that he "stalked" the show and had to be removed from the stage, according to court records.

"I wanted to have a life with the show," Taylor said in the Sunday edition of the Daily News of Los Angeles. "I loved the show enough to be a part of it."

It has happened before, said Marki Costello, who has been coordinator on 22 programs, including "Hollywood Squares" and "The Gong Show."

"They feel like they have a relationship because they were treated so special the day of the show," she said. "They don't realize that when we're done with them, we're done with them. On to the next show."

Taylor said he awaits the day the suit is dropped so he can keep trying for a job on the show. Until then, he is watching from home, Taylor said.

2 victims for the price of 1

NEW YORK — Police officers thought there was something familiar about the man who flagged them down to say he had just been robbed.

"My partner goes, 'This is the shooter from two hours ago,'" Officer Thomas Kelly said.

Chris Applewhite allegedly matched the description of a gunman who shot a teen-ager in the stomach early Sunday. The victim was in stable condition.

Minutes after the incident, Applewhite was robbed at gunpoint of his burgundy leather jacket, police said. While they held him, they saw another man toss a leather jacket and pistol under a nearby car and arrested that person on a robbery charge.

"This is one for the books," Kelly said.

Bus falls into ravine killing 43 in Quebec

ASSOCIATED PRESS

ST.-JOSEPH-DE-LA-RIVE, Quebec — A bus carrying senior citizens on a Thanksgiving Day trip to view the fall foliage plunged into a ravine Monday in central Quebec, killing 43 of the 48 people aboard.

Quebec provincial police said the accident took place in the afternoon about 60 miles northeast of Quebec City. The bus was traveling on Highway 138 and crashed at the bottom of a steep hill going into a hard right curve.

Real Ouellette, a Quebec provincial police spokesman, said faulty brakes were the likely cause of the tragedy. There were no skid marks at the bottom of the dangerous hill, where 15 people died in an accident 20 years ago.

The five survivors were taken to hospitals in nearby Baie-St.-Paul. Michelle Robitaille, a spokeswoman for the Charlevoix Hospital Center there, told The Associated Press that five injured people were brought there in critical condition and four of them were transferred to a trauma center.

Monday's crash was the deadliest in Canada in recent memory. The passengers, who belonged to a senior citizens club in the Beauce region southeast of Quebec City, were on an outing for Canada's Thanksgiving holiday, Ouellette said.

Conditions on the twisting road were dry and the weather was sunny. The hill has a steep grade and is marked by warning signs. Automobile drivers usually take it in first gear and even then brake frequently.

The bus was headed for Ile aux Coudres, a vacation island in the St. Lawrence River, where the changing color of the leaves is especially brilliant this time of year.

The island is reached by ferry from St.-Joseph-de-la-Rive, a small town with a maritime museum, restaurants, gift shops and farms. The area is popular with tourists.

"There was absolutely no reaction from inside the bus," said Rev. Jean Moisan, one of the first people to reach the vehicle. "I didn't hear anyone crying for help."

A 1974 accident at the same location took 15 lives. Moisan, a local priest for 30 years, remembered that crash, apparently caused by engine trouble.

"The worst is having to come back here tonight," he said. "It is horrible to realize nothing was done."

At the site there was renewed anger that nothing had been done to make the hill safer — only a low guard-rail exists at the bottom of the hill.

"People are really concerned about this," Moisan added. "They are going to have to do something about this now."

Emergency workers and passersby helped shuttle bodies from the bus, which was propped on its side in the ravine between the hill and an elevated length of railroad track that straddles a tributary of the St. Lawrence.

ANDERSON

the street. They set up a flashing control, a speed control and sometimes even a policeman is sitting there to make sure that people are obeying the rules."

MacFarland said the Anderson widening has exactly the opposite effect.

"In the sense that the south edge of campus has an enormous amount of pedestrian and bicycle traffic, it seems to me that the only proper thing to do is to treat it as a school zone. The project tries to speed up traffic and increase traffic in that area. Would we stand for that at an elementary school? It doesn't make sense to me," he said.

City statistics support the widening and addition of a turning lane, MacFarland said, because they show a large number of accidents caused by unsafe left turning conditions on Anderson. MacFarland not only questions the merit of the statistics but also said the city is enacting too many changes at once in order to remedy the problem.

"We've not tried left turning signals without left turning lanes," he said. "The city says that would make traffic back up, but who cares if traffic backs up if it's safe? With this plan, we're going straight from having no arrow to having an arrow, coordinated signals and left- and right-hand turning lanes. We're going straight from four lanes of width south of Memorial Stadium to six."

That increase in width is dangerous for pedestrians, MacFarland said.

"At Denison Avenue, the present crossing distance is 49 feet. Under their plan, it will increase to 93 1/2 feet. That means pedestrians and bicyclists will be exposed when they do try to cross the street for almost twice as long," he said.

MacFarland said the longer crosswalk wouldn't be so bad if responsive signals were in place that allowed pedestrians to push a button for the walk signal. But under the city plan, coordinated signals mean pedestrians will wait their turn. According to MacFarland's proposal, that creates too great a danger.

"If pedestrian crosswalks remain as they are (at street level, with walk-light request buttons), the hoped-for improved traffic flow will come to a halt at any occupied pedestrian crosswalk if the crosswalk is set up to be truly responsive to pedestrians.

"However, I have been told by city officials that traffic signal responsiveness to pedestrians is not a priority. Instead, the crosswalk request buttons will be tied in to the more elaborate traffic signal timing system envisioned, so that the crosswalk light will only turn red when it will least interrupt the flow of vehicular traffic," MacFarland's proposal said.

But Messer said that won't affect pedestrian safety, because when lights do turn red, they will do so long enough to allow pedestrians ample time to cross.

"For a pedestrian, even though they may have to cross a wider Anderson Avenue, they will be given more time to do so. The signal system will be coordinated to create longer gaps for those pedestrians to cross," Messer said.

MacFarland said he still disagrees with the principle that makes a heavy flow of pedestrian traffic wait for motorists.

"The periods during which a long swath of traffic will flow along Anderson are supposed to increase, likely causing pedestrians to wait even longer. Meanwhile, the people in cars and trucks are protected from adverse weather, noise and fumes. Pedestrians who tire of the long wait and who try to dash across the street illegally had better be good sprinters, given that the roadway in some places will be nearly twice as wide as it is now," according to MacFarland's proposal.

MacFarland said he represents residents from throughout the city, not just the area affected by the proposed project.

He encouraged interested residents and students to contact him at his home about AWARE meetings and activities.

Messer said the project will still need to receive final approval from city commissioners, and MacFarland said that's exactly why concerned citizens should get involved.

"If enough people feel as I do that this is a flawed plan and they let the city commissioners know, I think there's a good chance of stopping it. They have the power to stop it just like they had the power to start it, but they have to believe that all of the city, including the students, doesn't want it to go through," MacFarland said.

AWARE

flow increase would mean a 6-mph increase in average speed on Anderson. That, he said, simply isn't good enough.

"It is clear from the traffic consultant's own projections that the city's stated goal of improving traffic flow is simply not going to be achieved in any meaningful way by the project. $7 million later, at peak traffic times we'd wait 10 seconds less at one intersection, maybe 35 or 40 seconds less at another, experience no change at all the rest, and go about 6 mph faster on average," according to MacFarland's 22-page document. "It is in 'bang for the buck' that the Anderson Avenue project is found to be truly unworthy of construction."

Messer said he disagrees. He said a one-letter-grade improvement is a definite change for the better. He also said comparison statistics aren't totally accurate, because they compare traffic, estimated at 25,000 vehicles per day, to traffic that the widening is being designed for, estimated at 35,000 vehicles per day. That makes one letter carry more weight, he said.

"The overall level of service is improved essentially from a D to a C for the entire corridor ... You have to realize that this if for the design volumes. You're talking about the design volumes being something like 35,000 vehicles where currently it's around 25,000 vehicles," Messer said. "What is reported in that traffic report is for the design volumes. Then you're comparing it to the existing level of service. Even though it doesn't look like much of an improvement, it really is. To go from a D to a C is a definite improvement."

the first speaker of the Landon Lecture Series, Alfred Landon in 1966. The 1968 lecture from Sen. Robert Kennedy and the most recent lecturer, William Cohen, are also available on the Internet.

"There are only a few of the past speakers available now, but we are working with the library to archive several other old audios," Caffey said.

The K-State Division of Continuing Education is also working with Internet audio service providers to try to get a site that can hold thousands of listeners instead of just a few hundred students.

"I think that the lectures being broadcasted on the Internet is a neat way for the university to reach different students who aren't able to attend the lectures," Jon Scantlin, senior in architectural engineering, said.

that campaigns usually can bring in written commitments of $50,000 to $1 million.

"The amount of money donated depends on the number of alumni and the geographic distribution of the alumni," Esau said. "Another thing to take into consideration is the circumstances of the project."

The total amount donated can depend on the size and generosity of the alumni group. Pennington associates will usually meet in person with prospective donators who might contribute a large sum of money.

Fritchen said that preliminary plans can be shown to alumni at this time to show them that initial plans have been made, and support for the project is the next step.

In order to allow portions of large gifts to be tax deductible to the donor, the greek chapter can set up an educational foundation, which would be used as a charitable foundation. Donations will be used to fund educational areas of the renovated or expanded house, including such areas as the library, individual study rooms and computer rooms. Money can also provide furnishings, fixtures and equipment for those spaces.

> "Renovations are a necessity for greek houses in order to stay competitive with other housing facilities."
> • Dave Fritchen
> Delta Upsilon chapter adviser

Once the chapter gets a good amount of financial support, the remodeling process can begin.

An architect should be hired to finish up the final plans for the project and can also help out with zoning plans. Property line zoning and easement must be looked into in order to be up to date with city zoning laws. Eventually, approval must be given by neighbors and the city zoning commission in order for the project to begin.

Contractors must also be hired to obtain supplies for the project. Greek alumni can be valuable assets in a project when they donate or offer building supplies at a reasonable price. A construction manager also might be hired for the actual construction part of the process.

"That's the bureaucratic part of the project. The next step is to phase the project," Fritchen said.

The phasing process will determine when construction will actually take place. Project phases are set at different times during the year so members can live in the house, but not be disturbed. Remodeling will generally take place during the summer when members are not living in the house.

"Our construction project will go through three phases over two years, which will begin in the spring of 1998," said Brian Vulgamore, Delta Upsilon president and senior in agricultural business. "For us, it's not too much of an inconvenience because we don't allow members to live in the house during the summer anyway."

> "For us, it's not too much of an inconvenience because we don't allow members to live in the house during the summer anyway.
> • Brian Vulgamore
> Delta Upsilon president and senior in agricultural business

Beta Theta Pi has already begun remodeling its house. Construction began immediately after finals last semester.

"We updated the individual rooms, bathrooms and installed a new heating and air-conditioning unit," Kye Hittle, Beta Theta Pi president and senior in electrical engineering, said. "The new additions will save us money in the long run."

Hittle said that money will be saved with the addition of a new phone system to decrease the amount of individual phone bills.

Double-paned windows were also installed in order to save energy during cold and hot days. Each room will also have Internet access.

"It's really not an inconvenience anymore, compared to what it was at the beginning of the semester," Hittle said. "Contractors were still here working in August, but now all that's left to do is some painting and tiling in certain places."

The Betas also have plans to add on to the back of their existing house. Hittle said plans have not been finalized yet for this addition, but they hoped to begin sometime in spring 1998.

Many smaller decisions on remodeling usually can be made by each chapter's alumni board, which is usually responsible for getting a construction project in motion. Most greek chapters at K-State have alumni boards that volunteer time and knowledge to improve chapters.

"It pays off in the long run to have alumni members who have connections and can handle the many different areas of remodeling a house," Vulgamore said. "It also pays to have a strong alumni board."

In the near future more greek houses at K-State will make renovation plans.

"Renovations are a necessity for greek houses in order to stay competitive with other housing facilities," Fritchen said.

Fliter said. "Working with other groups on campus, ACLU encourages students to take a broad interpretation of the Bill of Rights."

The misconception students have is that this organization is for law students only.

"Everyone faces these issues and everyone is welcome to come," Elliott said.

Jeri Blaske, senior in advertising and vice president of ACLU, said interest for joining the organization was prompted by an interest in the media.

"A year ago I had no idea what ACLU was," Blaske said. "What interested me was that it's not a political group. They just try to to help people that are being treated unfairly."

The group is still a discussion-based group, but they are hoping to increase membership and raise money to bring in speakers.

"Our meetings range from having five to 50 people attend. Now is as good a time as ever to get involved in what we do," Elliott said.

The group will have a meeting next week, and all students are encouraged to attend, she said.

For more information, contact Fliter in the Department of Political Science.

FEES

50 cents per credit hour for a maximum of $12 per student for 15 years.

Ticket prices would still be $60 per student for four years and would give graduates of the past two years discounted season tickets as well.

Jeff Meder, committee member, said the stadium will expand even if it isn't funded by students.

The committee also met with members of the Board of Student Publications to review its equipment fee. Todd Simon, chairman of the Board of Student Publications, said members want to focus less on individual matters and more on operations.

Simon said his objectives are to persuade the committee to give Student Publications Inc. another two years of funding and to review Student Publications' fee annually.

"We really need this type of funding to keep the Collegian and the Royal Purple ahead of the game," Simon said. "They are considered leaders in the use of technology."

Simon said Student Publications is not spending at the rate it anticipated, and it foresees the spending in the additional two years also will be less than expected.

"We are beneficiaries of advances in the computer industry. That causes prices to go down," Simon said.

"Most of the bids are coming in at a little less than originally thought," he said.

The Privilege Fee Committee and the Board of Student Publications will make amendments and corrections to the bill. It will be reviewed again Monday.

The committee also proposed a contracting service that would conduct internal audits of student services using student fees. Aaron Otto, committee chair, said the auditor would work 1,000 hours a year.

"It is a win-win situation," Otto said. "We are using half of the person's time and really getting a hell of a deal."

Otto said any service not up for review during the year would be audited.

"It's an $18,000 investment to see how $8.3 million is being spent," Otto said.

Homicide suspect still in critical condition

ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — A homicide suspect who shot himself in the head after shooting three police officers during a standoff remained in critical condition Monday evening, police said.

One of the officers who was shot remained in serious condition.

Police said earlier that the suspect, David E. Minish, 30, was not expected to live.

Minish was charged with first-degree murder and aggravated battery in the death of his estranged wife, Precious A. Butler, 23. She was shot to death Sept. 7 in her home.

Minish was charged Sept. 8 and had eluded arrest since then.

Acting on a tip, officers went to a home Saturday evening, and an elderly woman in a wheelchair let them in. Four went inside, while two made sure Minish didn't leave, said Police spokesman Officer Willie Jenkins.

As officers opened a door into the basement, Minish fired several shots.

Jenkins said it was still being investigated whether the officers fired back.

Police did not release the names of the injured officers, but said all had been with the department about three years.

The one who was most seriously injured was hit just once, but the bullet apparently went through his leg and hit his arm before lodging in his ribcage, Jenkins said.

Another officer was grazed on the arm, and the other was grazed between the neck and shoulders.

The shootings led to a 12-hour standoff between Minish and police. Police went back into the house about 6:15 a.m. Sunday and found Minish in the basement suffering from an apparent self-inflicted gunshot wound to the head.

"Cemetery of Innocence" will be constructed in the free-speech zone located to the north of the K-State Student Union and left as a display for the entire week. The crosses in the cemetery symbolize the fetuses that die from abortions. During this week, members also write letters to the editors of the Collegian and The Manhattan Mercury.

Last year, money raised through a bake sale, church donations and allocations from SAC paid for seven members to travel to the three-day March for Life rally in Washington, D.C. Because this year marks the 25th anniversary of the Roe vs. Wade decision, Ziegler anticipates the participation to be good. They are taking a bus to Washington, D.C., in January. They will leave Jan. 19 and arrive on Jan. 20. They will meet with Congressional leaders, attend conferences with speakers, attend a prayer vigil and participate in a prayer and demonstration in front of the Supreme Court.

Ziegler said it is such a powerful experience to see all those people there for the same reason.

To recruit members, they have a table at the Activities Carnival, send information to local churches and depend on word of mouth. Anyone can participate, regardless of religious denomination.

"It is the most rewarding thing I've ever done," Ziegler said.

15, 15-10, and pleased McLaughlin with their defensive efforts. K-State limited the Red Raiders to a .181 attack percentage and had 18 blocks, including 12 by junior middle blocker Val Wieck.

Wieck also had 10 kills and 13 digs to record her first career triple-double.

Freshman middle blocker Branting led K-State with a .367 attack percentage and junior hitter Kim Zschau had a match-high 23 kills.

"I think we did well," sophomore outside hitter/middle blocker Dawn Cady, who had 20 kills, said. "We picked it up from the last time we played, and I think that's what we gotta keep doing– pick it up a little bit."

With the Cats' Baylor victory Friday and the Texas Tech 3-1 victory on Saturday, combined with other week-three results — Colorado's 3-2 win at Nebraska and the Cornhuskers' 3-0 loss at Oklahoma — the competition is wide open again.

"With Nebraska losing in three to Oklahoma, we're back in the hunt," McLaughlin said. "We just have to take care of the ones we have to take care of."

Nebraska, Colorado and Oklahoma are the three conference teams that have beaten the Cats this season. Now that the top Big 12 teams are beating up on each other, K-State has managed to climb back into the race.

The results from around the conference came as a surprise to K-State's players.

"It's not that I couldn't see Nebraska being beaten, but I just didn't see it happening bitta-bing, bitta-bang," Ryning said. "Every team's stepping up. Every team is so much different than I expected this year."

The Cats' stepped-up efforts came at a good time. K-State had lost three consecutive matches to ranked opponents, and McLaughlin said the No. 36 Red Raiders were not a pushover.

"They were a pretty good team. Texas Tech is good," he said. "They've been beating some good teams, and they've been in every match. They're solid in every way. They make you earn it. It was a good match for us."

The victories over Baylor and Texas Tech were K-State's first consecutive wins since nearly a month ago, when the Cats won five in a row between Sept. 3 and Sept. 16. K-State will try for No. 3 on Friday at Iowa State, and will play again Saturday at Missouri.

The Cats hope this weekend's wins will help them go on another run.

"Now we've got two good wins behind us, one real good one and one medium one, and we're more confident. I can see it in the girls' eyes," McLaughlin said.

CHIEFS

widely acclaimed free-agent signee and a supposed go-to guy for quarterback Elvis Grbac.

But Perriman only recorded six catches for 83 yards in five games this season after missing training camp because of a hamstring injury.

In a way, it was Marty's way of admitting Perriman was a mistake by letting him go. Grbac and fellow wide-out Andre Rison had formed a bond, and Perriman was not happy about being the one who got the ax.

He'll be a great target for Miami quarterback Dan Marino, which is something Marino desperately needs right now.

To help out at linebacker because Derrick Thomas is still a big question mark, the Chiefs picked up Green Bay linebacker Wayne Simmons for an undisclosed 1998 draft pick.

Simmons started all 16 games last year, recording 76 tackles and 2.5 sacks. So far this year with the Packers, Simmons has 27 tackles to date in six starts.

These mid-season moves can only help the Chiefs achieve the success they crave.

Much of this year's success has been the result of hard work by young players such as free safety Jerome Woods and strong safety Reggie Tongue.

New talent added to the team in the form of draft picks Tony Gonzalez, Kevin Lockett, Clyde Johnson and Pat Barnes prove that this team is looking to the future.

But behind the scenes there is underlying tension from the old guard. The import of so much talent and the export of so many veterans has left the Chiefs' locker room divided.

It's a very subtle division, but it's there. You can only see it or hear it by looking closely and listening carefully.

That's the beautiful thing about team sports. When you're winning, the whining comes in whispers. Lose a few games, and those whispers come in roars.

The same roars that tore the Chiefs apart in 1996 are threatening to kill this season unless Schottenheimer can keep this group winning.

And if he pulls that off, I say give Marty the Coach-of-the-Year award. But please wait until the end of the season to send in your ballot.

DEFENSE

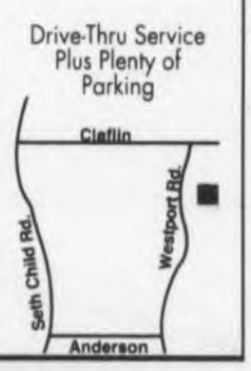
past three years, Missouri has only been able to score 21 points off the Cats. This year alone, the Cats were one point shy of doubling Missouri's output. For their part, the Cats have scored 106 points off the Tigers the past three meetings.

"Basically what happened is we went out there and got a good butt-kicking," Missouri offensive lineman Jeff Marriott said.

With the loss to K-State, the Tigers are now 1-2 in Big 12 Conference play and 3-3 overall. Two of the Tigers' losses came at the hands of ranked opponents, Ohio State and K-State.

Of the three option teams the Cats have played this year, the win over Missouri was their first dominating performance against an option team.



"We just have a basic way we play option football teams, and that's what we did," Snyder said. "We played it the same way we played Nebraska. Sometimes we make it work, and sometimes we don't."

▶ BRAMLAGE FEE EXPECTED to pass through Student Senate without problems.

KELLY FURNAS
eCollegian editor

The first privilege fee to come up for debate is expected to be a no-brainer.

Bramlage Coliseum's privilege fee, which is estimated at $34,000 over the next two years, or $1 a semester per full-time student, is expected to go up for debate on Monday. Due to its simplicity and small size, neither side foresees problems in it passing.

Charles Thomas, director of Bramlage, said the fee is directed toward the maintenance and repair of the air conditioning units in the coliseum.

"The fee was set up to give us a safety net for our rooftop units," he said. "We have to keep those things running."

Although Bramlage has asked for the same amount of funds the past three times it has come up for consideration, Thomas said the amount spent varies from year to year.

"Some years we spend $12,000, some years we spend $20,000," he said. "We build up a reserve so we can make sure to keep the building up and running."

Aaron Otto, Privilege Fee Committee chair, said Bramlage was chosen to come up for debate first because it was a noncontroversial fee which was small in comparison with the other fees.

"This is by far the smallest one we have," Otto said. "It's a good one for student government to learn from. It's good practice for us."

Otto said Bramlage's fee, which makes up a half percent of all privilege fees, was so small that it was the only one that didn't have a board of directors to oversee the fee.

Otto said he didn't expect any problems with the Bramlage fee passing, but said he had heard talk of lowering the fee due to the fact that Bramlage had built up a strong reserve. At present, Bramlage has $98,681 in reserves.

Bramlage funds

The Bramlage Coliseum repair and replacement fee, a privilege fee K-State studetns are required to pay, is $34,634. It is 0.41 percent of the total Student Governing Association budget of nearly $8.3 million. The student-generated money goes into reserve funds for Bramlage.

Student body could vote on plus-system grading

TRAVIS D. LENKNER
staff writer

The backers of the failed plus-system grading proposal want to take the vote directly to the student body.

Student Body President Tim Riemann and Vice President Jennafer Neufeld have proposed a plebiscite vote on the grading system to gauge student opinion about whether the current system should be changed.

The plus system resolution proposed by Riemann and Neufeld failed Student Senate, but not before the possibility of a plus-minus system was raised. Both systems would involve changing K-State's grading system to include pluses or pluses, and minuses instead of straight-letter grades.

Under the original plus system, B-pluses, C-pluses and D-pluses would be added to the traditional grading scale. Those grades would count as .3 more than a straight-letter grade to figure grade point averages. The plus-minus system keeps the pluses and adds an A-minus, B-minus, C-minus, and D-minus to the list of grades that instructors can assign. These count as .3 less than a traditional letter grade.

A plebiscite vote would be open to every K-State student. Results from the vote would be considered the official student body opinion. Students would choose between the plus system, plus-minus system and the traditional system now in place.

Student Senate Vice Chair Tracey Mann said gauging student opinion is important.

"I think the students should voice their opinion. There has been a lot of confusion about what the students really wanted. We need to have the plebiscite to see how the students feel," Mann said.

Neufeld said seeing what students want is the goal of the vote, but it will also make the issue a student body issue and not one that is just being addressed by student government.

"It's not who's pushing for it or who's backing it. We just want to see what the students want and go from

Plans for city pools surface at meeting

DAVID FAIRBANKS
city editor

Zero-depth wading pools, water cannons, drop slides, lily pad walks and spray fountains were some of the additions to Manhattan's public pools suggested by Larkin Aquatics Inc. of Kansas City, Mo., in Tuesday night's City Commission policy session.

David Schwartz of Larkin Aquatics presented the City Commission with the results of the company's recent aquatic study done on Manhattan's public pools. He outlined the condition of each pool and followed with recommended plans of action for each one.

For City Park Pool, Schwartz recommended adding a drop slide to the deep area and replacing the shallow water area with one much larger. He also suggested adding shallow water slides, a lily pad walk and 20-foot-diameter umbrellas for shade. He said the city pool's biggest problem is that its shallow water area isn't large enough.

At CiCo Park Pool, Schwartz recommended taking out the rectangular shallow pool and upgrading it to a large circular body. Adding spray fountains, play features and a seated shallow area would make the renovation complete, he said.

He also said he would like to see the size of Northview Park Pool nearly doubled. However, the pool poses some unusual redesign problems, he said.

"The pool is completely landlocked by a parking lot, a school, a ball park and overhead power lines," he said.

To go through with the proposed expansion of Northview Park Pool, a joint venture between the city and Northview School would have to take place, he said. Schwartz's plans showed the pool expanding onto school property.

The redesign plans for Douglass Park Pool contain a number of options, the first being a complete restructuring of the area. The pool would be torn out and replaced with a water playground. It would contain water toys, spray fountains, water cannons and equipment much like that of an Oceans of Fun. However, it wouldn't be a pool. It would have a slightly curved, porous floor to soak up the water. This would cost an estimated $500,000, Schwartz said.

The second option would be to simply expand the pool's size. A simple expansion would cost about $800,000.

The third option would be to reduce it to a wading pool that would not get any deeper than 3 feet. And the fourth option would be to close it, which was suggested because of its deteriorating condition.

This option, however, was met with much resistance from area residents at the meeting. Many citizens asked the commission to ignore that option. Their main point was Douglass Park Pool is a much-needed attribute to the south side of town. Many residents in that area have transportation problems and are not able to travel to the other pools.

Schwartz said Manhattan's public pool system is missing two things — an indoor public pool facility and water-toy equipment at each pool. Although Larkin Aquatics' primary plan would solve for the lack of water toys, a plan for an indoor pool has not been adequately addressed. However, Schwartz said that option should not be counted out.

"An indoor pool would be the biggest thing you could do," he said. "An indoor facility will better provide for your needs than any combination of outdoor facilities."

City Commissioner Roger Reitz said he'd like to see a pool program form as a result of the meeting so the public could address needs and concerns. Commissioner Ed Klimek said he agreed.

"I think this is an excellent study," he said. "I'd like to let the people speak to us about their wants before we move on. We need to see what's best for the city as a whole."

UPC presents first Network Event Theater to full house

MARY RENEE SMITH
staff writer

Six hundred students filled Forum Hall to capacity to see a sneak preview of the movie "I Know What You Did Last Summer" Tuesday night.

The film does not open in theaters nationwide until Friday, but students at K-State and 30 other universities had the chance to see it early via satellite hook-up from the Network Event Theater. This was the first satellite event from NET presented at K-State.

Paul Donovan, chair of the NET committee for Union Program Council, said UPC was surprised by the turn-out. "We knew it was going to be big, but not this big," Donovan said.

Mike Hodgson, president of UPC, said the publicity and talk around campus helped bring out the audience. "It's a sneak preview, this is an event people want to see," Hodgson said.

Students started lining up at 6 p.m., some had even taken seats in Forum Hall and had to be asked to go back outside before the film began.

Jay Stenfors, freshman in finance, was one of the students who was turned away after the hall was filled. "I've waited to see this movie for a few months," Stenfors said. He said he was disappointed.

The show started 10 minutes late and the first few minutes of the movie were very dark. A few audience members left the movie complaining they couldn't make out the figures on the screen. The problem was corrected after a few minutes and the audience cheered in appreciation. There also was a slight hissing and popping sound during the film. Donovan said they would discuss the problem with NET and

Faculty Senate expresses concern about periodicals

COLE EHMKE
staff reporter

Concern about the reduction of periodical subscriptions and library financing was expressed during the Faculty Senate meeting Tuesday.

Several long- and short-term recommendations, in light of the budget cuts announced this semester, were developed and presented to Senate by the Library Task Force.

Cynthia McCahon, chair of the task force, said it recommended an absolute minimum of 5,000 print journals be maintained for all disciplines as a short-term solution. Hale Library has 6,600.

The task force also recommended using a sliding scale of 5 to 20 percent to reduce the print subscription suspension from $500,000 to $300,000, McCahon said.

Department reductions will be based on several criteria including the rate of subscription inflation, proportion of the overall periodical budget and the average cost per periodical subscription.

Because of the rising cost of journals and to make up for the $200,000 cuts, money will be reallocated from other areas of the university.

The task force recommended cutting $100,000 from scholarly journals, $50,000 from the provost and president's offices and $100,000 from the rest of the university, McCahon said.

She said it also recommended $225,000 be reallocated from further print periodical subscription reductions and graduate teaching assistant salaries among other areas in 1998-99.

Long-term solutions included the identification of future financial resources such Horticulture center provides service to eastern Kansas

LESLIE NACHTRAB
staff reporter

K-State's Department of Horticulture, Forestry and Recreation Resources will be one step closer to its horticulture research and education center in Olathe, Kan., when its main access gate opens Oct. 27.

The center, which is situated on a 260-acre safety zone in the southeast corner of the Sunflower Ammunition Plant, near DeSoto, Kan., has been building a fence around its perimeter to separate it from the ammunition plant. The fence is scheduled for completion on Oct. 24. Until then, employees have been entering through the security gate of the plant.

The proposed horticulture center is being built to serve the industry in the eastern part of Kansas and as an educational resource to community colleges in the area.

Tom Warner, department head, said 110 acres will be dedicated to horticultural crop research and will conduct variety trials for trees, shrubs, turf grasses, floral crops, and fruits and vegetables.

"We'll be testing new varieties to find out what will do well in the eastern part of Kansas," Warner said. "We'll also do what's called cultural practice trials. That is, how can we minimize the amount of water, fertilizer and pesticide into a product and still have the highest level of quality in that product, and quantity as well."

The other 150 acres are forest and will be used for woodland-owner and environmental education.

Warner said the center will serve as an important education tool. Community colleges will use the center for hands-on experience. A program has already been planned with Johnson County Community College.

"They can be in their classroom at the junior college and hear about theory and concept, but they need to come out and learn about the plant material in a lab," Warner said.

He said the partnership K-State is developing with community colleges is important.

"More and more people are finding that higher education can be an expensive proposition," he said. "Community colleges are growing by leaps and bounds because of the convenience of starting that educational program there. If the students are there, we need to be there."

Warner said he also hopes elementary and high school students will use the center.

"We could have volunteers to teach them about where their food stuff is coming from and find out about the woods and surrounding environment," he said.

Warner also said that K-State horticulture students will be able to benefit from the center. He said he could see people who live in the area having their internship with the center.

The department is raising the money privately to construct three buildings on the center. The buildings include a place for equipment storage and repair shop; a main building for offices and classrooms; and an educational pavilion for large educational functions and field days. Warner said a development group of citizens and industry people are working to raise between $2.25 million and $2.5 million for the buildings. He said he hopes to have the center complete by 2000.

The Kansas National Guard will build all roadways, irrigation systems and low-water crossings for the center in the spring as part of it's training projects, Warner said.

Homecoming should provide chance to build campus unity, spirit

Homecoming is supposed to be a time for the campus to come together, but that hardly seems to be the case at K-State.

For the past few years, at least, Homecoming has been dominated by greeks and greek events. The residence halls do participate, but only in a feeble attempt. Even the traditionally black sororities and fraternities have created their own separate events.

It's ironic to think that only one week ago, the events of Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week were celebrating the idea of coming together as a community. And with Homecoming, those thoughts of unity have dissolved into separate but equal activities.

Have Homecoming and Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week become meaningless gestures to an apathetic student body — events the university touts simply for appearances but that are soon forgotten by impatient and restless students? What is the purpose of such events if their messages are ignored the next week?

Homecoming is not a racial issue, but it's an issue of school pride for all students, not just those who are forced to participate or face stiff fines. It is certainly not just another reason to get hammered and party every night of the week, which is more a mockery of the ideals of campus communal spirit.

Perhaps the Dean of Student Life's office should take charge of organizing Homecoming. The current planners, Greek Affairs for the IFC and Panhellenic greeks and KSU Pan-Hellenic Council for the traditionally black greeks, should stay involved, but it seems only logical that the one campus office that encompasses the entire campus should organize a campus event.

The highly successful Purple Power Play on Poyntz could be an excellent cue for programming for future Homecomings.

Somehow, this event brings together people from a multitude of backgrounds for one exciting evening of pure K-State spirit. Could it be much harder to do that on campus with students and alumni?

One mother's love becomes allegory of grace

"I hate you, Mom!"

With those four words, Becca stormed from the house, the sound of the slamming door echoing in the ears of her mother.

The young girl's mother had seen this coming. From the day her lovely daughter had turned 13, those eyes had blazed with a seemingly unquenchable passion. Now, three years later, that passion had exploded.

It had been unavoidable.

The arguments, the silence and finally the explosion — her mother's heart had felt it coming long before her mind would let her believe. She knew her youngest daughter had taken both money and jewelry when she had left. That did not matter. She was gone. As her eldest daughter Diane, burst into the living room, the mother lay down on the sofa and wept.

She simply wept.

As she sped out the gate, past the housekeeper's little house and down the dusty road, Becca's eyes also brimmed with tears.

"She just doesn't understand me," Becca thought, her anger causing her tears to spill onto her flushed cheeks. "Well, I'll show her. I'll live life like I've always wanted to!"

And she did just that.

When Becca reached the city, she immediately sought out an older girl named Luci. Luci had promised to "take care" of Becca should she ever decide to leave home. She had promised the young girl that she would show her all the town had to offer — and more.

Luci kept her promise.

She and Luci moved into an upscale apartment in what was considered the "rich" section of town. Over the course of six months, Becca met more people, drank more liquor and had more sex with more different people than she had thought was physically possible.

And the drugs. The variety of ways to get high blew her mind — nearly literally.

Becca and Luci spent the money Becca had stolen with abandon. When that money ran out, they sold the expensive jewelry she had taken and used the proceeds for more of the same indulgences.

VIEWPOINT

KEVIN BAILEY

KEVIN BAILEY is a senior in elementary education. You can send your e-mail comments to Kevin at (kevinsb@ksu.edu)

In selling the jewelry, Becca felt a twinge of guilt. One of the pieces was a locket that contained a picture of her mother and her father. Her father had died when she was very small. Her mother had given it to her for her birthday several years before. She had never taken it off — not even when she left home. But, when it came right down to it, the gold locket was worth close to $500, and she knew she must sell it.

So she did.

At the corner she and Luci liked to call "The Marketplace" she was able to hock it to an older lady for close to $1,000. She was shocked, and would have stayed to talk to the woman, but Luci urged her on — the night was calling, so she said. Becca left the woman standing at the corner.

Finally, the money ran out. The eviction notice came a few weeks later. The landlord was fed up with Becca and Luci's wild lifestyle, and Becca had missed one month's rent. She had two weeks to be out.

She was on the street in less than one. Luci had left during the middle of the night — simply slipped quietly out of bed and was gone.

Becca had rolled over, and Luci was no longer there.

She had gone out to search for her, and when she had returned — without Luci — the next morning, the doors were padlocked, and all her possessions were on the front porch. Becca felt sick — and not only physically.

For the next few weeks, she lived on what she had been able to pawn her possessions for and sold herself for money and drugs.

Then came even more horrible news.

She was pregnant — and six months pregnant at that. There was not much thought behind what came next. The abortion was quick. She wondered if the child had been a boy or a girl.

Finally, sitting in a dank, smelly room in a seedy motel, she came to a decision. The man and woman who had bought her sex had left, and only a few roaches remained to keep her company.

She decided to go home.

She would ask her mother to take her on as a housekeeper, and she would earn her keep. She had no idea what her mother would say. She wondered if her mother even still loved her. She was sure that stories had come back to their big house on the hill.

But she knew she must go.

As Becca approached the big house, she saw her mother sitting on the front porch gazing rather intently in her direction.

Suddenly, a look of recognition came across the face of her mother, followed closely by a wondrous smile. She sprang from the porch, and ran down the long driveway toward her youngest daughter. There was something in her hand, and as she embraced Becca, she slipped it over her daughter's once-proud head.

It was the locket.

"I love you, Becca."

With those four words, Becca came home.

"The father said to his servants, 'Hurry! ... Put a ring on his finger and sandals on his feet. My son was dead, and has come back to life again. He was lost but has been found.'" — Luke 15:22, 24

New museum becomes focus of world

The Oct. 18 opening of architect Frank Gehry's Guggenheim Museum in Bilbao, Spain, has become the architectural event of the decade.

Not only has the fluid building elicited worldwide praise, it has been the subject of books, lectures and countless newspaper profiles without even opening its doors.

If the name Frank Gehry does not strike you, it should. No other American architect in the past decade has done more to push architecture into a new direction through actual practice. Since his humble beginnings in the 1960s, Gehry has grandfathered a sheer architectural revolution in Los Angeles.

VIEWPOINT

RUSSELL FORTMEYER

RUSSELL FORTMEYER is a senior in architectural engineering. You can send e-mail to Russell at rmf@ksu.edu

At symposia and lectures in the avant garde Los Angeles architectural community, younger architects simply can't escape Gehry, finding a need to place each new, deconstructionist project in the context of the master. As much as they want to distance their own talents from him, they can't, and it is generally agreed that an entire school, the so-called "Gehryschule," has arisen in the city.

Gehry is the quintessential architect-artist, having consciously set out to explore the same territory as contemporary artists. He has twice collaborated with the great pop artist Claes Oldenburg.

His best work is characterized by exploding plains and kitschy details, a celebration of basic construction materials like corrugated steel and plywood, and the tweaking of classical shapes recast in fantastical forms. The most recent works, particularly the Guggenheim, can be characterized as a refinement and departure from earlier work.

The Guggenheim is a radiating flower in plan; the elevation is complete with soft petals of undulating, stainless steel walls that drift into boxy, earthbound limestone forms. Punching through the flowing, lyrical forms are cascades of deeply gridded glass.

Some have likened Gehry's recent work to that of ships in full sail or, on the negative, shoeboxes left in the rain. It should be noted Gehry achieved his seemingly unbuildable forms with help from advanced aircraft design computer programs. Is it any wonder the Guggenheim wants to lift off the ground?

The singularity of the building brings to mind the original, landmark Guggenheim Museum in New York City designed by another master of the 20th-Century, Frank Lloyd Wright. Both Gehry and Wright are individualists who have a personal language.

In 1953, Lewis Mumford wrote Wright's "expansiveness, his exuberance, his inclination to put both form and function high-handedly at the service of his own singular genius are an essential part of his inexhaustible creativeness." The same could be said for Gehry.

Contrary to some criticism, Gehry can build a highly functional building. The Guggenheim, a museum showing modern and contemporary works, doesn't need to be as functional as a speculative office block.

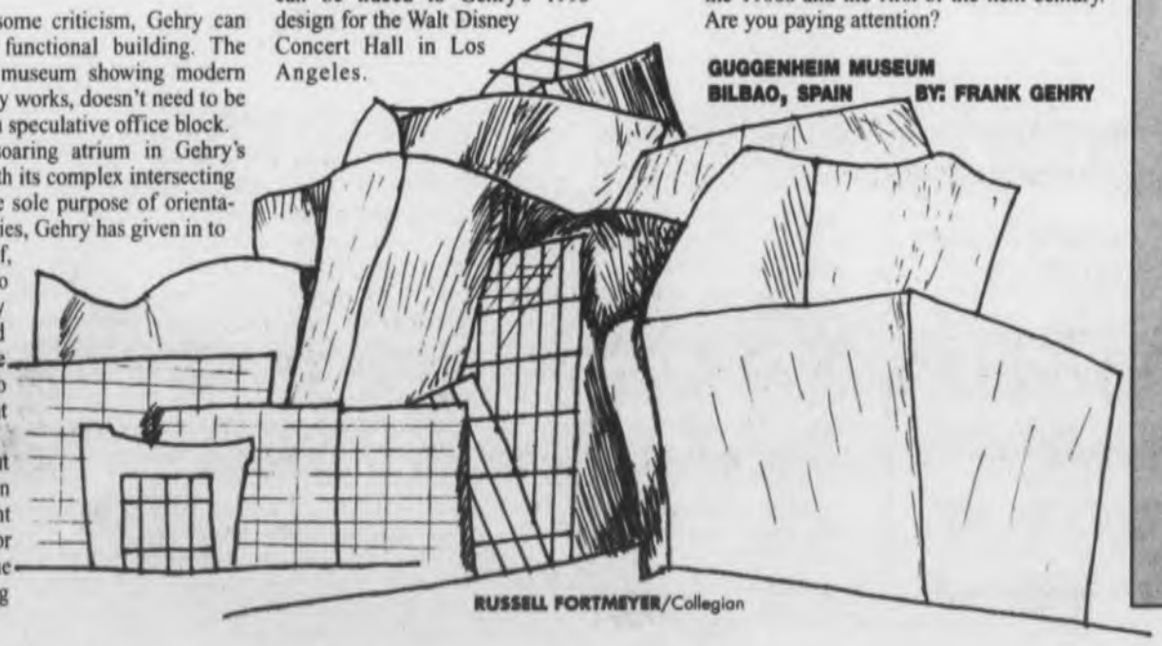
Hence, the soaring atrium in Gehry's Guggenheim, with its complex intersecting forms, serves the sole purpose of orientation. In the galleries, Gehry has given in to the art itself, choosing not to upstage it the way Wright's curved walls of the Guggenheim do in its present incarnation.

I say present incarnation because Wright never intended for more than one painting to hang in the naturally-lit bays of the semi-conical atrium in which one slowly winds to the top. Some might consider that a flaw in the building, but I can't recall much art that has been shown in the New York Guggenheim that was worthy of the building.

This building-as-art concept is readily applicable to the Guggenheim Bilbao. The truth is, the reason culture-mongers will make the pilgrimage to Bilbao is for the building; the art is secondary.

The media attention and acclaim alone does not make the Guggenheim important. The world's publicity machine has been wrong before on architectural accounts. Even Paul Goldberger, the New Yorker's architecture critic, at a recent lecture in Kansas City, Mo., praised the museum as the most important building of the last few decades.

The Guggenheim is special because it is a masterwork by a master architect — the culmination of years of thought, process and study in one building for the ages.



The forms achieved at the Guggenheim can be traced to Gehry's 1993 design for the Walt Disney Concert Hall in Los Angeles.

Although this project is in development hell, to use Hollywood's terms, the soaring, limestone waves of the hall will be realized.

Ideally, Disney Hall would have been completed before the Guggenheim, giving Los Angeles the attention it deserves as the locus of new American architecture. A few Los Angeles writers have criticized the Guggenheim as the "Disney Hall, Bilbao," but that would be missing Gehry's evolving approach to design and the masterful way the museum is integrated into the industrial city of Bilbao.

The architect Charles Jencks, in his revised 1994 book, "The Architecture of the Jumping Universe," asks of the Guggenheim's design ethos, "What if the city grew like a quasicrystal, and an ever-changing order emerged which never quite repeated?" Jencks calls this complexity building.

The Guggenheim strives to answer that question and live up to its complexity by bringing architecture a new struggle to overcome. This is the last significant building of the 1900s and the first of the next century. Are you paying attention?

UGB made correct decision with Union McDonald's

Editor,

I would like to recognize Bernard Pitts and the members of the Union Governing Board for demonstrating quality leadership with regard to the McDonald's issue. Sometimes good leaders must say no.

It disturbs me to see the student body continually being taken advantage of. The student body represents a captured market of more than 20,000 students who kick off millions of dollars in cash every semester.

If you notice, people are lined up to get a piece of this action, but student leaders do not always recognize the bargaining leverage they possess.

For example, Commerce Bank implies that they are doing the students a favor by increasing the banks potential customer base by more than 20,000 people. Students should be grateful that Commerce Bank is willing to handle their money (Do you think any other bank would refuse the chance to tap into this market?)

Students also paid for a large portion of the library expansion, which now has nearly no journals (who benefited from that deal?).

Students also agreed to pay for the K-State Student Union expansion in the same semester that the City of Manhattan annexed the university and imposed a sales tax on all transactions within the Union (who benefited from that deal?).

Students also pay for an expensive athletic department that benefits local business profits, local residential property values and student athletes, but does not add value to a scholarly student's education or career marketability.

If you really believe a good football team increases your chances of getting a job when you graduate, you should try studying.

Students do not have to pay for everything, and student leaders must realize that they have a huge bargaining chip when they sit down to negotiate with money-seeking individuals. Students should be milking the profit-seekers, not the other way around.

At best, student leaders must recognize that we are not so desperate for action on this campus that we are willing to give away the farm to get it. Students deserve and must demand a return on their invested dollars.

Good job, UGB!

HALO members earn honors, recognition at conference

LANDON TRAWNY
staff reporter

Leo Prieto, junior in pre-medicine and president of the Hispanic American Leadership Organization at K-State, received an outstanding achievement award for his work with youth in Garden City, Kan., this summer.

Prieto attended the U.S. Hispanic Leadership Conference in Chicago, which is meant to bring Hispanic and Latino groups together to learn more about issues that affect them and to honor individual achievements.

He said he was surprised to receive the award because other interns did similar work in larger cities.

"I knew I'd be recognized, but I didn't know I'd get the award," Prieto said.

Prieto received training in Chicago from the Hispanic Leadership Institute as a student community organizer. He then went to Garden City and worked to register people to vote. He also worked with 25 incoming high school freshmen on leadership, cultural awareness, community involvement and athletics issues.

Prieto said he especially enjoyed the children who attended the conference.

"They are the present, so I wanted to work with them," Prieto said.

The award was just one of the highlights for HALO at the conference.

Rosario Ibarra, sophomore in accounting and HALO member, said the 30 HALO members who went to Chicago were the biggest group the K-State Chapter of HALO has ever sent.

She also said more than 7,000 people from 37 states attended the conference and that it was the largest attendance ever.

"It was so big, we had to move it to a different location this year," Ibarra said.

Carlos Contreras, sophomore in business and arts, said this year's conference had more dynamic speakers and better workshops than it had in the past, but the networking HALO members did was especially valuable.

He said HALO plans to keep in close contact with other Hispanic and Latino groups from all over the country.

"We'll be able to work together to accomplish common goals throughout the state as well as the nation," Contreras said.

Prieto said one person he was glad to meet was Henry Cisneros, president and chief operating officer of Univision Communications.

Cisneros expressed his willingness to help and support HALO in its efforts to get Univision carried locally by TCI of Kansas.

"All we have to do is call, and they will help," Prieto said.

Prieto, Ibarra and Contreras said they thought the U.S. Hispanic Leadership Conference helped to motivate people to strive for high goals and make communities better.

"We each have an obligation to change the world," Prieto said.

E-mail fraud case has no leads

BRANDI HERTIG
staff writer

Almost a month later, no fresh trails have been found leading to the computer culprit who sent sexually explicit e-mail and pornography to 450 residence hall Listserv members using Privilege Fee Committee Chairman Aaron Otto's e-mail address Sept. 16.

"They left no trace," Harvard Townsend, Unix and networking manager, said.

Townsend said investigators were able to pinpoint from which computer and the exact time the message was sent.

The message came from a lab that hadn't been converted to the new operating system, Townsend said. The suspect used the mail feature on Netscape to forge the e-mail. That feature is no longer available in the upgraded labs.

Other than that finding, Townsend said they were not able to find additional evidence. Searches beyond what are normally made were conducted, with permission of the vice provost.

"We took it as far as we could," he said.

Towsend said someone other than a K-State student could have forged the message.

"It could've been anyone in the community," he said. "The only way the person would be caught is if they came forward or if someone squealed on them."

Man bargains for lesser sentence in '93 series of armored-car heists

CONCORD, N.H. — One of six men accused in a series of armored-car heists in New England pleaded guilty Tuesday to reduced charges.

John Burke, 42, pleaded guilty to conspiracy to commit a holdup in 1993 in Seabrook. Prosecutors agreed to drop all other charges against Burke in return for the plea.

The indictments said the robbers wore ski masks and jumpsuits, used machine guns, assault weapons, police scanners, two-way radios and disguises in the series of robberies that began in 1990 and were spread over five states.

Burke was the only one of the six not charged with the most brazen heist the gang is accused of, in Hudson in 1994. In broad daylight, two guards were shot to death, and the robbers escaped with $500,000. The amounts in other holdups have not been released.

Lawyers have said Burke fell out of favor with the group because of drug use. He faces up to 20 years in prison and a $250,000 fine on the conspiracy charge. Charges are pending against the other five men.

Court fines to be paid out in food; donations to benefit hungry

SIMPSONVILLE, S.C. — Caught speeding? That will be $25, paid out in cans of tuna. Wrote a bad check? Baby food, $55 worth.

In Magistrate Don Hensley's court, offenders give back to the community — in food that goes straight to the poor.

He put his idea into practice last month and has already raised $4,000 worth of food for two local agencies. Five other magistrates in the state have asked how to start their own program.

Hensley, 45, remembers his own hungry times. Raising a family and going to school, he and his wife and their two children got by on macaroni and cheese and peas. Occasionally, they splurged and added tuna to the peas.

"I've often wondered why the government didn't plant mulberry trees, pear trees, or pecan trees along highways or government buildings ... so anybody who was hungry could pick the trees," he said. "I'm not in the position where I could do that, but I am in a position to do what I'm doing".

Only nonviolent, petty offenders are made to pay their fines in food, Hensley said.

Bomb task force joins investigation of gunman

ASSOCIATED PRESS

ATLANTA — The task force investigating the Olympic bombing and two other Atlanta attacks found bomb components at the home of a man accused of gunning down two police officers.

"It was brought to our attention, and we're looking in to it," FBI spokeswoman Celestine Armstead said Tuesday. "That's all we are prepared to say at this time."

Federal and state bomb investigators were called in Monday after Atlanta police arrested Gregory Paul Lawler, 45, on charges of murder and aggravated assault in the shooting death of Officer John Sowa, 28, and the wounding of Officer Patricia Cocciolone, 35.

The task forced seized the explosive materials from Lawler's apartment along with militia manuals and stockpiled weapons. It was not immediately known what sort of explosive materials and firearms were seized.

The task force — formed after the 1996 bombing that killed one person and injured more than 100 during the Olympics — took over investigation of the January bombing at an abortion clinic and the February bombing of a gay nightclub when it was decided all were probably related.

Recently, the task force released composite sketches of a bearded man believed to have been in the areas of the two most recent bombings.

Officials of the FBI, Georgia Bureau of Investigation and Atlanta police declined to say Tuesday whether Lawler, who had a beard at the time of the shootings, could be the man in the sketches.

Atlanta police spokesman John Quigley said Lawler cut his hair and shaved his beard during a six-hour standoff with police at his apartment after the shootings.

Sowa and Cocciolone were shot as they investigated a report that Lawler was beating his girlfriend. Lawler allegedly fired 16 shots at the officers. Cocciolone remained in critical condition Tuesday.

SGA officer payment to be altered

> If I wouldn't have this job, I would be working somewhere else for money. The scholarship is a reward and compensation for not being able to work.
> • Jennafer Neufeld student body vice presidnet

SARA BURDETTE staff reporter

Working for the government might provide extra benefits. The Joint Committee on Officers' Compensation has proposed a new salary system for individuals in student government.

Bill Muir, committee chair, said Student Senate sets salaries based on criteria that get into personality and not facts.

"We needed a third party to look at it objectively," Muir said.

The committee evaluated the criteria and created the compensation based on duties and responsibilities of the officers. In addition, Muir said the committee also looked at compensation programs at other Big 12 schools and modeled the criteria based on its findings.

In addition to setting up alternative criteria, the committee is hoping to introduce scholarships as part of compensation so students can get money in a lump sum, rather than spread through the year, Muir said.

The change in compensation will provide raises for all of the paid officers. It will also add compensation for some chair positions that have not been paid in the past.

Muir said although some students don't agree with paying committee chairs, the committee allocated compensation according to the level of responsibility.

Originally, the committee was concerned with where it would find the money for the compensation. Gayle Spencer, Office of Student Activities and Services coordinator, said office workers have found money within the budget for the extra compensation.

The scholarships are handled the same way regular compensation is, Muir said. The student government transfers the money to the Office of Student Financial Assistance and the scholarship is then deducted from the student's tuition.

If officers resign or leave office for some reason, they will not receive the scholarship for the following semester and compensation will stop. Spencer said she foresees some kind of written agreement stating if a student leaves office, then a form of pay back would be implemented. The committee has not developed any formal agreement regarding the issue.

Jennafer Neufeld, student body vice president, said she is supportive of the plan.

"If I wouldn't have this job, I would be working somewhere else for money," Neufeld said. "The scholarship is a reward and compensation for not being able to work."

Neufeld said she and many of the other officers put in at least 15 to 30 hours a week in the office. More time is spent out of the office.

Muir said unless someone brings amendments against the plan, it will be implemented and go into effect with the next set of officers.

Senate compensation guidelines to change

The following is a breakdown of new compensation guidelines for Student Governing Association officers that will take effect with the elections of new officers unless a resolution is passed that objects to the recommendation. The recommendation would change the current salary system to a combination of salary and scholarship. The total at the right would be the new total the officer would receive.

Officer	Current Salary	Proposed payment alterations: Scholarship	Proposed compenstation	Total
Student Body President	$3,600	$1,800	$1,800	$3,600
Student Body Vice Presidnet	$2,400	$1,300	$1,300	$2,600

Human Ecology Dean to retire after 14 years

MATT KREPS
staff writer

After 14 years advancing her college's virtues, Barbara Stowe is retiring.

Stowe, dean of the College of Human Ecology, said the time was right for her to step down.

"I'm retiring because I've reached that magical age when retirement is possible," she said.

Stowe's list of achievements is long and filled with milestones for her college.

During her tenure as dean, the honors program increased from 12 students to more than 110 students. Outside funding for research in the college increased from about $500,000 to more than $4 million a year. K-State also became more recognized in the field through its research and extension projects.

"We also just completed funding development for an addition to the stone house children's center," Stowe said.

The Hoeflin Stone House serves as a focal point for the speech pathology and audiology departments. The departments joined the College of Human Ecology three years ago.

Stowe also served on several national organizations during her years at K-State.

She was appointed by U.S. Agriculture Secretary Dan Glickman to the 30-member National Agricultural Research, Extension, Education and Economics Advisory Board. She also served in several positions for an array of land-grant college committees.

Stowe is also helping promote issues relating to the human ecology field in Washington, D.C., through the Human Sciences Institute that she helped create.

"She has done a first-rate job as dean of the College of Human Ecology," President Jon Wefald said. "Barbara has had a very impressive career as dean."

Wefald cited increases in faculty quality, research projects and promotion of K-State's human ecology programs as evidence of Stowe's hard work.

He also praised her perseverance. Few deans stay in their programs for as long as Stowe has, Wefald said.

IVAN KOZAR/Collegian

BARBARA STOWE, dean of the College of Human Ecology, is planning to retire at the end of the academic year. Stowe has been dean of the college for 14 years.

"She's had a long run as dean of human ecology," he said.

Stowe said she plans to slow down in her retirement. She will continue to work as a consultant in human ecology. She also plans to spend more time with her husband who recently retired from teaching veterinary medicine in Michigan.

Stowe said adjusting to retirement will take some time, but she is looking forward to it.

"I've learned a great deal about administration and working with people," Stowe said. "I will miss those kinds of things that I do on a day-to-day basis."

New veterinary students called more qualified than ever before

LORI GUILFOYLE
staff reporter

This fall, 100 students were admitted to the College of Veterinary Medicine to make up the class of 2001, a class referred to as the most qualified students ever admitted to the college.

"The veterinary students of today are some of the brightest, most committed young people that we have ever welcomed into our ranks. The future of our profession is truly in good hands," Mary Beth Leininger, past president of the American Veterinary Medical Association, said.

"It is extremely important that only the most highly qualified candidates be admitted to the 100 available positions in the first-year class," Ronnie Elmore, associate dean of veterinary medicine, said.

The average grade point average for the students' pre-professional requirements is 3.6 on a 4.0 scale, Elmore said. They average more than four years of college and have earned, collectively, 64 bachelor's degrees and seven graduate degrees.

The students are now in the first semester of the four-year veterinary medicine program. Students enroll in 20 to 25 hours of veterinary-science courses each semester.

"Because of the need for a broad, cross-species biomedical education, students in the professional curriculum must be superbly prepared academically to handle the heavy course load. No other professional training demands such an intense educational experience," Leininger said.

The class of 2001, made up of 65 women and 35 men, was selected from a pool of about 700 applicants. An enrollment cap limits the number of students who may enroll each year. This fall, 384 students enrolled in the college.

"Tomorrow's veterinarians, graduates of one of the oldest and most respected colleges of veterinary medicine in the world, Kansas State University, will be among the most highly qualified health professionals in the world," Elmore said.

He anticipates members of the class of 2001 will provide the highest quality care for their animal patients, lead their research colleagues in discovering new drugs and therapies, discover new ways to ensure that the nation's food supply is the best and the safest in the world and provide veterinary service in areas yet to be discovered and developed.

Office works for equality

JOHN HENDERSON
senior staff writer

The quote on Clyde Howard's computer screensaver reads, "We judge ourselves by our best intentions. We judge others by their worst acts."

Howard, the director of K-State's Office of Affirmative Action, said he can't remember where he first read the quote, but it fits the task of his office well.

"I just wanted something up like the Biblical 'Judge not, lest thou be judged,'" he said. "It's a reminder to be open-minded."

He said the main goals of his office, when investigating one of the 10 to 25 claims made by K-State students, staff and faculty every year, are to be fair and to make sure everyone involved knows the office is being fair.

Howard said this task involves providing information to all parties involved so there's never any doubt.

Claims are often filed with the police department first, which refers the complaint to Howard.

Complaints can be any form of discriminatory harassment based on gender, race, national origin, sexual orientation, religion, disability or ethnicity. The nature of the claim can be employment, access to a university program or service, or even between two people.

Howard's office doesn't normally investigate claims that occur off campus. For on-campus cases, however, his office is responsible for the investigation and resolution of the situation, he said.

The affirmative action staff follows due process, the same way a law enforcement agency investigates a crime. They begin by gathering basic information from the parties involved and testimony from any credible witnesses, he said.

"At the end of a process," he said, "there are basically three conclusions you can make, based on the information you have."

The first option is determining a violation did occur and a sanction can be made. The sanction can be anything from a written reprimand to suspension or expulsion from the university.

The second option shows an incident occurred, but no report is filed.

Food to be collected during body-building

ANGELA BUCCIGROSSI
staff reporter

As hundreds of greek and residence hall members pour into Ahearn Field House on Wednesday night for the Homecoming body-building competition, they will be helping feed Manhattan's hungry families this holiday season.

The entry fee for the evening's competition is a can of food for the K-State Cats for Cans food drive.

The can collection is the beginning of several organized collections for the semester-long project.

"Basically the start is Homecoming. This is the first activity for Cats for Cans this year," Emily Emerson, Cats for Cans chair, said.

Cats for Cans is a universitywide project to raise food for the Flint Hills Breadbasket. All of the nonperishable food items collected will be distributed by the Breadbasket in the holiday season, Emerson said.

"Generally, it provides most of the food for their Thanksgiving and Christmas baskets," Emerson said.

Last year Cats for Cans raised 70,000 pounds of food for the Flint Hills Breadbasket. This year, they have set a goal of 90,000 pounds, Emerson said. Several different campus groups are planning on organizing their own projects and events to help raise cans, including the Order of Omega greek honorary and the Panhellenic Council.

Tonight, members from Order of Omega and the Panhellenic Council will be collecting canned food items at the doors to the preliminary body-building competition.

The can collection was implemented as the entry fee to the competition a couple of years ago because of the increased interest in making Homecoming more beneficial to the community, Chris Hansen, Homecoming coordinator for Interfraternity Council, said.

Homecoming

"We really feel it's an important part of Homecoming to give back to the community and show them it's not just about greek houses having fun," Hansen said.

Members from the two groups will be collecting cans at the entrance on the north side of Ahearn when the doors open at 6 p.m. The body-building competition will begin at 6:30 p.m. and should last until about 8:30 p.m. The competition is open to all students, as well as the public.

Pan-Hellenic Council encourages unity

JOHN HENDERSON
senior staff writer

The K-State chapter presidents of eight historically African-American and Latino-based greek student organizations answered questions about the chapters Tuesday night in the Big 12 Room.

Stacy Yeager, president of Sigma Gamma Rho sorority at K-State, said although her sisterhood is historically and predominantly African-American, the group is based on unity among all people.

"If you can't find it in your heart to love somebody, then that's a personal problem," she said.

Tamara Abdulhaqq is adviser to the K-State chapter of the Pan-Hellenic Council, which governs the nine national historically black fraternities and sororities, seven of which were represented at the meeting.

Santos Ramirez, president of Sigma Lambda Beta fraternity, was a guest of the Pan-Hellenic Council. The group is predominantly Latino, and Abdulhaqq said she was glad he represented another multicultural student organization.

Abdulhaqq said the council, in addition to the promotion of standards of leadership, ethics and achievement among members, is committed to service, particularly with the Boys and Girls Club of Manhattan.

Terrence Flowers, president of Kappa Alpha Psi, said his fraternity sponsors such charities as Adopt-A-Highway and Kappas Against Illiteracy. Errol B. Williamson Jr. listed Reading Is Fundamental and the Manhattan Breadbasket as charities Omega Psi Phi supports.

Cintoria McKoy, of Zeta Phi Beta, brought up her sorority's national campaigns against breast cancer and asthma in black women, and the chapter's relationships with residents of St. Joseph Senior Community. Dewan Gardner, vice president of Delta Sigma Theta, said her sorority donates its time to Habitat for Humanity.

Brandon Hobbs, representing Alpha Phi Alpha, said Nov. 15 is the date of the seventh-annual Neak Frasty step show, which raises funds for Thurgood Marshall Scholarships.

But, in addition to the opportunities for community service, all the representatives gave unity as a prime reason to be greek.

That unity can help in all kinds of ways, especially after graduation. Flowers said being able to network with other brothers and sisters, even those from other Pan-Hellenic groups, can help when seeking employment and internships.

Daneeka Marshall, of Alpha Kappa Alpha, said next week is AKA Unity Week, when the sorority campaigns for unity within the sisterhood and with other greek organizations at the national and local levels.

"It's really good to say, 'That's my sister,'" Marshall said. "We support each other."

as student fees, fund raising, a percentage of the athletic activity revenue and contracts from vendors like Coca-Cola or Pepsi.

A full report of the task force will be released by Nov. 3.

Brice Hobrock, dean of Hale Library, said the issue had been brought up every year, but no action was taken because everyone ran out of ideas about library funding.

In other business, Vladimir Krstic, chair of the Faculty Senate Committee on University Planning, said Senate should have known about the hiring freezes that were reported in Monday's Collegian.

Many senators said they were concerned that Faculty Senate was being left out of the decision-making process and had no control of the situation.

Krstic said a dialogue between administration and Senate needed to be created.

Jim Legg, Faculty Senate president, said it must continue to remind the administration that Senate should be included in decisions that involve faculty members.

OFFICE

In that case, he said, the report is closed.

The final option occurs when the information is insufficient to determine what happened.

Howard said the case might remain open or closed, depending on the details, when this happens.

Though Howard said the number of complaints per year is never static, assuming 25 per year, about eight are sanctionable, and three are insufficient.

The remainder are situations where a complaint is made, but no violation occurs.

"Basically what we ask is, 'Does the complaint fit the definition?'" he said. "If it does, we inform both parties, and provide a copy of the complaint. Then we get their side of the story."

After the decision is made, he said, the parties involved can appeal. Students can file appeals with SGA. Faculty members file appeals with the faculty grievance committee and any other staff members have their own committees.

"The primary goal is to ensure that the situation is resolved," he said. "We want to prevent any further discrimination and restore any losses."

FEES

"I don't like to predict things," he said. "But I don't expect to see any surprises."

Thomas said that lowering the fee would have a detrimental effect on Bramlage, and funds would have to be raised somewhere else.

"If they were to drop the fee, we would have to cut back on services from somewhere else," he said. "Right now, I'm not sure where that would be."

Thomas said he was asked to submit three scenarios to the Privilege Fee Committee: one that took into account a 5 to 10 percent increase in the fee, one that had the fee staying the same and one that had the fee dropping 5 to 10 percent. Thomas said he didn't submit a scenario that called for an increase.

"We're not asking for any more money," he said. "Any little bit that we can get we're grateful for."

Thomas agreed with Otto that the Bramlage fee was not controversial or complicated.

"Ours is dirt-simple compared to some of the others they have to deal with," he said. "There is nothing creative to be done with the fee."

work on a solution together.

Following the film, movie-goers had the chance to ask questions of the director and some of the actors in the film. David Woemmel, sophomore in biology, called the UCLA campus, the site of the presentation, but due to the number of callers did not get to ask a question.

"We were going to ask if she felt cheesy saying the line 'I feel your pain,'" Woemmel said. He said he thought the interactive portion of the program went fine, but the same schools seemed to keep getting through.

The NET provided the equipment and satellite feed for the movie. In exchange, UPC will set aside at least six days per month for exclusive use for a NET program. UPC also agreed to not charge admission to the events. Upcoming events include the documentary "Taxicab Confessions 4" on Tuesday and a Dennis Leary performance in November.

Donovan said despite the small problems, the event was a success.

VOTE

what the students want and go from there," she said.

Senate Intern Coordinator Kim Peschka said the vote would also give the student body a reason to learn about the complex issue.

"This would also give people an opportunity to get more educated about it and learn more about what each option is," Peschka said.

Traditionally, plebiscite votes are combined with spring student government elections to save funds because special elections cost money. But with the possibility of a Nov. 11 referendum vote on expanding KSU Stadium, Neufeld said she and others have considered adding the grading system question to the football vote.

"Certainly we would be interested if there's a possibility of combining them," she said.

Riemann said Tuesday that the possibility did exist, and that Athletic Director Max Urick had given his approval to add the grading question to the football referendum ballot. Student Senate will still have the final say about whether or not to combine the two student body votes.

Unless the grading plebiscite is added to the football referendum, Riemann said he won't have a chance to make students' opinions about one of his campaign platforms become a reality.

"It would be up to someone else to pick it up. That would be up to individual senators or the next executive branch. That's why, ideally, it would be nice to get in on the November vote," he said.

WILDCAT REPORT

TIME CHANGE REMINDER

The game time for the Texas A&M football game Saturday is 2:30 p.m., not 1:10 p.m. as listed on the schedule. The time was changed to accommodate ABC, which will televise the game for regional broadcast.

TICKETS REMAIN

A few hundred tickets still remain for both the Saturday game vs. Texas A&M and the Nov. 15 game vs. Colorado. They can be purchased for $31 each from the K-State Athletics Ticket Office at Bramlage Coliseum or by calling (800) 221-CATS.

CATS WILL REMAIN ON WEST SIDE

The football team will keep its bench on the west side of the field. "It's quieter and more efficient to work with, and yet there's not that buzz that you would think the players would like," Coach Bill Snyder said. "There wasn't enough reason to change."

INJURED PLAYERS PROGRESSING

The outlook is good for two injured Wildcats. Defensive tackle Damion McIntosh's playing time will continue to increase.

"I couldn't tell you that he's 100 percent, but he has made very good strides," Coach Bill Snyder said. "He's practicing just fine."

McIntosh has 13 tackles, 10 of them solo, and two sacks in four games this season. Four of his tackles have been for a loss and he has forced a fumble.

Free Safety Lamar Chapman is also making progress after an elbow injury. "Lamar's doing pretty well," Snyder said. "I'm uncertain exactly when we'll have him back full-scale, but he's doing better. There's an outside chance (Chapman could play)."

Chapman was injured during an extra-point attempt in the first quarter of the Oct. 4 game vs. Nebraska. He was named Big 12 Special Teams Player of the Week for the Sept. 13 game vs. Ohio in which he had 17 tackles, forced and recovered a fumble and returned a punt 94 yards for a touchdown.

CHILD ID DRIVE AT KSU STADIUM

The American Football Coaches Association has organized a program to identify more than 2.4 million children this year.

Kits will be distributed to fingerprint children and list identifying marks and doctors' phone numbers. The information will be kept at home to be provided to law enforcement authorities in case of emergency.

The kits will be passed out at the west, southwest, and southeast gates of KSU Stadium before the Texas A&M game.

"There's some interesting information in there," Coach Bill Snyder said. "It seems like an awfully worthwhile program."

TENNIS UPDATE

After losing her first two matches at the Arizona State/Miss Karen's Fall Classic in Tempe, Ariz., freshman Anna Pampoulova bounced back to win her next three matches, including the first round and second round loser consolation finals. She beat Darian Chappell of California-Irvine 6-2, 2-6, 6-2.

Senior Lena Piliptchak lost her match to Pepperdine's Angela Lawrence 6-1, 6-0 in the first round loser consolation finals (back draw) to finish in second place in the draw.

K-State's doubles team of Yana Dorodnova and Eva Novotna lost 8-6 to Southern California's Karolina Bakalarova and Veronika Safarova in the semifinals of the main draw.

"It was a strong tournament for us," Coach Stephen Bietau said. "The quality of the draw was very high and for us to make it to the semifinals was quite an accomplishment."

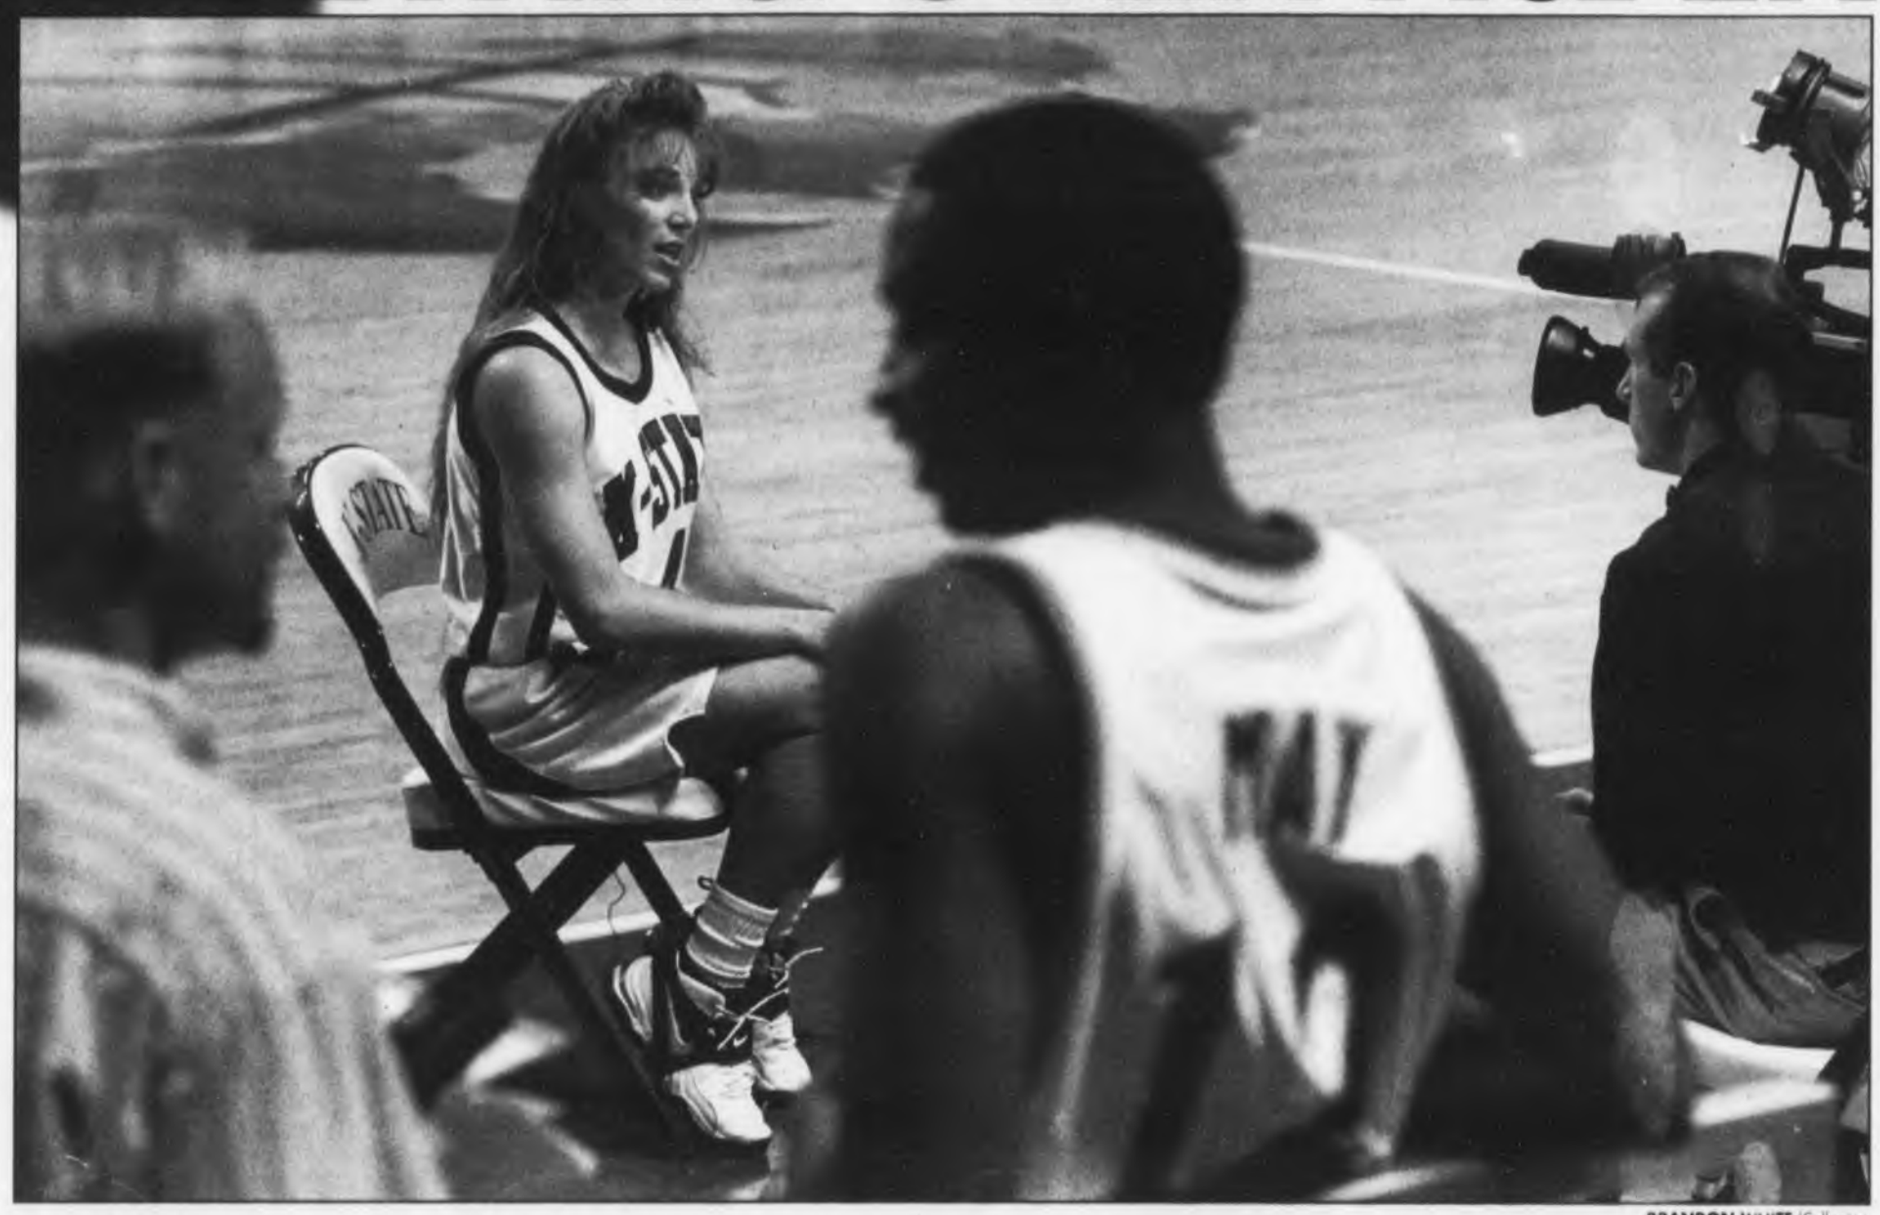
The next action for the Cats is the Hoosier Classic Oct. 24-26 in Bloomington, Indiana.

BASEBALL TEAM TO HAVE ITS OWN WORLD SERIES

The K-State baseball team wraps up its fall practice schedule with the intrasquad Fall World Series from Sunday through Oct. 25 at Frank Myers Field. The Cats will play a full seven-game series, with a double-header 2 p.m. Sunday and single games every other day at 3 p.m. Admission is free to all games.

WOMEN'S GOLF LEAPS AHEAD AT TOURNEY

The K-State women's golf team moved up one spot from the first day to finish 11th at the Big 12 Fall Preview Oct. 6 and 7 in Columbia, Mo.



The Cats shot a final round 333 for a three-day total of 990.

Oklahoma State won the event with a score of 921.

Junior Jane Yi led K-State, finishing 30th with 242.

COLLEGE BASKETBALL: THE RETURN

Wildcats add 7 new faces to roster

STORY BY SUN DEE MILLS

Coach Deb Patterson and her basketball coaching staff came into the K-State sports world much like freshmen in college at this time last year.

These days, more than half the members of her 12-woman roster are feeling the same way.

"What these freshmen are going through now, our coaching staff went through last season," Patterson said.

Five of the new women's basketball players — Kim Woodlee, Marshela Webb, Dee DeShay, Brandy Harris and Morgen Finneran — are straight from high school courts.

But community college transfers Heather Smith and Ewa Laskowska are feeling the freshman jitters right now, too.

"Yes, I feel like a freshman again, kind of," Laskowska said. "But they (younger players) are going to look to me to be a leader. I need to help the freshmen."

And Laskowska is a good example for a young player to model herself after. She played at Independence Community College for two years because she couldn't play Division I-A ball.

But not because she wasn't capable.

As a sophomore at ICC, Laskowska averaged 19.5 points, 10 rebounds, three assists and at least one blocked shot per game. She was a 1996-97 second-team NJCAA all-American as well as a Kodak all-American.

This earned her the honor of being one of the top 10 community college recruits in the country.

But upon her arrival in the United States two years ago, she couldn't speak a word of English.

Originally from Stalowa Wola, Poland, Laskowska mastered English at ICC and was named to the ICC President's Honor Roll and Who's Who in American Junior Colleges in the process.

Now, she just hopes to master the competitiveness of the Big 12.

"We have the talent with the players," Laskowska said. "We just have to work hard, and I'm sure we're going to play smart, because our coaching staff is very smart."

Most of the new players agreed that the coaching staff of Patterson, Kamie Ethridge, Sue Serafini and Bridgett Bonds Williams was the main reason they came to K-State.

"Most of the time, when Coach Patterson was talking to me, she was talking about Coach Kamie," Woodlee said. "She'd say, 'Who do you think's going to be able to teach you? Who do you want to learn from, somebody who's played on the national team, somebody who's played professional, or somebody that you've never heard of?'"

And this staff is very excited about the new group of players.

Patterson said the team enters the season with that excitement, much anticipation, uncertainty and a tough nonconference schedule.

Eight of the 10 nonconference opponents were NCAA Tournament teams last year, and the team has the potential to play as many as 15 games against tournament teams.

"We'll be throwing a lot of young players into the fire," Patterson said, "but we have a schedule that rivals any team in the nation."

This inexperienced Wildcat team might make its opponents breathe a sigh of relief when it appears on the schedule.

"It would be crazy for people not to take us lightly," Woodlee said. "Most people will take us lightly. That's what makes me smile."

Woodlee is smiling because she knows this is the same Cat system with the same coaches who were picked to finish 11th in the conference, minus four seniors. Last year's team had nothing to lose, and she said this year's team feels the same way.

Lone senior Brit Jacobson said she thinks the team will be just fine.

"These girls have taught me that it's not going to be that hard," Jacobson said. "We've got some girls who really want to play, who really want to work hard and who are going to contribute right off the bat. You know, we might surprise a few people."

Vasiljevic ready to play after being redshirted last year

JESS C. LOUK
staff writer

As a child, Pero Vasiljevic said, he chased kangaroos, threw a boomerang and played basketball.

"We really did chase the small ones," Vasiljevic said with a smile on his face. "Sometimes you could catch the small ones."

Vasiljevic

This is obviously not your everyday path to becoming a Division I-A basketball player. But Vasiljevic knew he wanted to play college basketball, so he became an exchange student and left Australia for the United States.

Indeed, everything was going right for Vasiljevic.

As an exchange student from Adelaide, Australia, Vasiljevic attended Valley High in the Los Angeles area, where he dominated the West Coast high school basketball scene. He averaged 25 points, 11 rebounds and 3.5

DO YOU KNOW THIS MAN? HOW ABOUT THESE NAMES?

THE LINE

Todd Weiner. Brien Hanley. Kendyl Jacox. Jeremy Martin. Ryan Young.

They're K-State quarterback Michael Bishop's personal bodyguards. If you think Bishop's 4.5 speed in the 40-yard dash makes him tough to take down, try getting past these guys. They weigh a combined 1,580 pounds, and the strongest of the bunch, Martin, can bench press 494 pounds.

They're the starting five for K-State's offensive line, and they know the Wildcats' offensive success starts with their blocking.

"When we execute well, we see the ball moving a lot downfield," Jacox said. "But when we're not, we see it in the backfield. That's one place you don't ever want it to be."

If this line played in the NFL instead of the NCAA, it would be the third-largest group in the league. But it plays Division I-A, and it hasn't had too many problems through the first five games of the season.

K-State's rushing offense, led by the holes the line creates, is ranked 12th in the nation. The Cats average more than 248 yards on the ground per game, including 429 against Bowling Green

STORY BY SAM FELSENFELD

Air Jordan deflates columnist's ideals

Never once did I think North Carolina men's basketball coach Dean Smith's retirement would lead me to stand two feet from Chicago Bulls star Michael Jordan.

When Smith retired last week after 36 years as the Blue Devils' head coach, it became an easy story to localize because Smith's replacement, Bill Guthridge, is a K-State alumnus.

VIEWPOINT

SUN DEE MILLS

SUN DEE MILLS is a senior in electronic journalism. You can send your e-mail comments to Sun Dee at sundee@ksu.edu.

I was then reminded that Guthridge's ex-Wildcat coach, Tex Winter, is now an assistant with the Bulls, and they were playing the Seattle SuperSonics in Lawrence last weekend.

My reporter's mind went to work. With the sole purpose of talking with Winter, I called the TV station I interned for this summer to see if it had an extra press pass.

"Well, no reporter here is crazy enough to try and deal with that madhouse in Lawrence, so yeah, we do," the sports producer told me. "But I'm sending a photographer to get the Michael Jordan press conference as well. Can you make sure that gets done?"

in week three.

"I like to call us 'The Tank' because I like to see us rolling over opposing defenses," Jacox said. "We may run out of ammo a couple of times or stutter, but we'll keep it rolling. Last week, that's what we did. Roll."

In last week's game against Missouri, Bishop found enough holes to rush for 196 yards, a school record for quarterbacks. But after the game, the attention focused on his running, while the blocks that were set up for him were virtually ignored.

> I like to call us 'The Tank' because I like to see us rolling over opposing defenses. ... Last week, that's what we did. Roll.
> • Kendyl Jacox offensive line

Hanley said whether they get attention doesn't matter to him.

"I'm just trying to do my job, and I'm sure that's what the others are trying to do. On offensive line you're not going to get a whole lot of hoopla glory anyways, so we just concentrate on going out and doing our job," Hanley said.

While the media tend to focus on the skill position players, the skill position players tend to focus on the linemen.

"They're always complimentary about how we play, and when we play, they always compliment us," Martin said. "It works both ways. They know we help them, and we know that they help us."

When practice lets out or the game ends, the linemen still stay together.

They spend much of their time together off the playing and practice fields.

Their off-field activities range from watching television to hanging out and talking, but they mostly involve eating. They come from different parts of the country, but eating is one thing they definitely have in common — they each weigh at least 300 pounds.

On Thursday nights, the group goes out for dinner together, and although they don't get a lot of media attention for their efforts on the playing field, they're well-known when they go out to eat.

"Usually, when I walk in a restaurant with Jeremy and Ryan Young, Ryan Young being a pretty large man, and Jeremy's not too small himself, usually we get some oohs and aahs and we get a lot of jokes," Weiner said.

To restaurant owners the sight of five linemen wanting to eat at their restaurants can be almost as scary as five linemen trying their hardest to keep you from their quarterback, Jacox said.

"They see us comin' in and they're like, 'We're getting ready to close,'" he said.

In addition to eating, they also like to play football when they're not in practice. But not the full-contact variety they play six days a week. Rather, they engage in Sony PlayStation wars.

Weiner isn't displaying the same skills in PlayStation football that he does in K-State football.

But the PlayStation season is still young, and he knows he has time to catch up to the level of his competition.

"Jeremy and Kendyl are probably the best right now, but I'm catching up," he said. "My execution's getting better, so I expect to beat them pretty soon."

"IT'S JUST ONE OF THOSE THINGS WHERE EVERYTHING JUST CLICKED."

What does it take to send a ball hurtling 76 yards with extreme pressure? K-State punter James Garcia explains his

PUNT STORY

STORY BY D. SCOTT FRITCHEN

K-State punter James Garcia kept his head down while he booted a career-high 76-yard punt during the third quarter against Missouri on Saturday.

He said he didn't have to look to know it was a good one.

"It's one of those things when you know it when you can feel it," Garcia said. "It's just one of those things where everything just clicked. It feels good. It's just like hitting a golf ball."

However, Garcia's punt was far from a chip shot.

With K-State stopped at its own 24-yard line after three consecutive plays for no gain, Garcia trotted onto the field with the wind at his back, hoping to pin Missouri deep in its territory with a solid kick.

As it turned out, the kick was too solid.

"It took a lot of wind to hit it 76 yards," Garcia said. "As far as I'm concerned, the things I need to concentrate on are getting the ball in the air and getting hang time and trying to drop it inside the 10-yard line."

Garcia's punting average of 44.6 yards places him third in the Big 12 Conference and 14th in the nation. Although Garcia's previous career mark of 70 yards came against Texas A&M last year, the kick that Texas A&M's special teams blocked last season still lingers in Garcia's mind.

"They blocked a kick last year, and you know they're going to come after the ball again," Garcia said. "I think our punt team as a whole, and our protection, has been pretty sound."

With the season almost half over, Garcia's average continues to approach former Wildcat and all-American Sean Snyder's 1992 season mark of 44.7 yards a punt.

Coach Bill Snyder said Tuesday that Garcia continues to work toward improvement.

"He's kicking the ball pretty well," Snyder said. "We're working with him on his pooch-punting a little bit. He just needs more work at it, which he is doing. Overall, he's hitting the ball pretty well."

Garcia spends 45 minutes punting during Monday and Tuesdays practices and continues to kick lightly throughout the week, allowing time for rest before Saturday's games. Placing extra emphasis on special teams is nothing unusual for K-State, Garcia said.

"We work quite a bit on it because we can't have any faults," Garcia said. "If one guy lets down, there's a crease, and they can get in and block it. A blocked punt can really turn around a football game, so we have to stay sound."

WHAT?!? My knees went weak. My mouth went dry. I needed to sit down.

The press conference was to take place at 5:30 p.m. at Allen Fieldhouse, so all I really had to do was set a microphone on a table. But to hear His Airness speak in person! I forgot about the Winter interview entirely.

The TV crew came to Manhattan for Saturday's Missouri game, so the photographer and I coordinated our schedules that morning.

We knew we'd have to break as many rushing records as Michael Bishop did against the Tigers to make it to Lawrence in time after the football game. So immediately after postgame interviews at 4 p.m., we hopped into our respective vehicles and sped down Interstate 70.

Sped to a grinding halt just past Topeka.

At the one-lane construction stretch, traffic east was backed up for miles. The photographer got on the phone with the station and learned the locker room was open until 6:15 p.m. We had plenty of time.

This meant I would have to interview Jordan directly. Gulp. What would I ask him? How do you spend $40 million dollars? Will you retire next season and break every NBA fan's heart? Do you feel like you're in Kansas anymore? Or are you awesome anywhere you are?

I had formulated my interview questions by the time we arrived in Lawrence at 5:30 p.m. We had now officially missed the press conference, meaning Jordan and I would meet face-to-face.

Because I had to return to Manhattan after the press conference, I followed the photographer's station vehicle to Lawrence. She had no parking pass, but usually people don't drive Ford Explorers with huge numbers painted on the side, so I never imagined parking would be a problem.

I forgot where I was.

We approached a lot on the west side of the fieldhouse and asked them where we should go. Typical KU students — they were clueless. They sent us to the other side of the fieldhouse.

A rude man in a burgundy polo with a walkie-talkie told us, "You have to have a pass to park here."

The photographer, pointing to the van, responded, "This is my parking pass."

Not good enough for the Jayhawk bureaucracy. We were told to move to the lot across the street but were not allowed to make the immediate left, because the street was blocked off.

After driving down two blocks, turning around, getting into the huge line waiting to park, paying $6 for parking, ending up far from the fieldhouse and going on a wild goose chase for our press credentials, we didn't get into the building until way past 6:15 p.m.

Talk about heartbreaking. I was all set for my in-depth interview with the greatest basketball player ever to play the game, the interview that would surely get me hired by ESPN (OK, maybe that's a little over the top), but to no avail.

So we went onto the court to tape a segment with a terminally ill child, whose last wish was to shake Jordan's hand. The kid was supposed to throw the game ball at tip-off, and he was positioned near press row so when Jordan and the Bulls came out to warm up, they'd run by and slap the kid's hand.

And then they came out.

Did the players come anywhere near the child faithfully wearing the No. 23 jersey? No. Did Jordan even look in the direction of the excited fans as they screamed his name and his praises? Barely.

As I stood two feet away from one of the world's greatest sports legends, my heart went out to that kid, because I knew his dream would never be realized.

But he just stood there watching, smiling like he'd had a two-hour conversation with the man.

I drove an hour and a half like a bat out of hell to learn something I really didn't want to know.

A great basketball player? You'll get no argument from me that Jordan's one of the best ever.

But a great person?

Well, now I have my doubts.

LOOKINGback

1905 — President Grover Cleveland wrote an article for "Ladies Home Journal" this day, joining others in the U.S. who opposed women voters. The president said, "We all know how much further women go than men in their social rivalries and jealousies... sensible and responsible women do not want to vote."

1951 — "I Love Lucy" debuted on CBS-TV this day. For the next 20 years, Lucille Ball would be a TV regular. She did take off for one year: 1956. Why? No, having little Ricky had nothing to do with it. She starred in "Damn Yankees" on Broadway that year.

"THIS IS A MAJOR CULTURAL INSTITUTION FOR THE STATE OF KANSAS."
NELSON BRITT, DIRECTOR OF THE MIRIANNA KISTLER BEACH MUSEUM OF ART

CLIF PALMBERG/Collegian

THE MIRIANNA KISTLER BEACH MUSEUM OF ART celebrated its one-year anniversary Sunday. The Beach museum has attracted over 30,000 visitors and has been host to nearly a dozen exhibitions since opening Oct. 13, 1996.

BEACH MUSEUM CELEBRATES FIRST YEAR

Director Nelson Britt reflects on past year, looks ahead to what future holds

RUSSELL FORTMYER
senior staff writer

The Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art celebrated its first year of operation with cake and ice cream Sunday.

The celebration reflects on a year of experimentation at the museum, with everything from exhibitions to lectures, from concerts to educational activities.

Nelson Britt, director of the art museum, said he was surprised by the amount of visitors in the first year of a new cultural attraction.

Britt said the staff had only expected 20,000 visitors, but the year brought more than 30,000 to the museum's exhibitions, lectures and activities.

Britt credited the large attendance to three things: the quick turnover in exhibitions, the diverse educational programs and the interest in the building itself.

"I think people really responded to the interior architecture," Britt said. "I think people wanted to come in because of the Chihuly chandelier."

In the first year, the museum staff did little in the way of marketing outside of news releases and some newspaper advertising.

Britt said that would change in the second year to keep attendance numbers high. He said the staff would be creating a brochure for Kansas visitor centers and networking with the Chamber of Commerce.

"No matter where I go, I let people know this is a major cultural institution for the state of Kansas," Britt said.

The art museum is also applying for a $20,000-$25,000 grant from the Kansas Arts Commission. Britt said the grant would be used for general operating support.

The first year has also meant more gifts to the museum, of both money and artwork.

"As long as we establish our identity and are serious about what we are doing, there's a whole new level of confidence in the museum," Britt said.

Over the past year, works by artists James Butler, Judith Streeter and Christina McPhee entered the collection thanks to private gifts and the support of the Friends of Art.

Two important drawings by native Kansan John Steuart Curry were given to the museum by the artist's widow, Kathleen Curry. The drawings are included in a current exhibition that will be up until Jan. 11, 1998. Sunday's informal celebration also commemorated the 100th anniversary of John Steuart Curry's birth.

The art museum's $1 million endowment hasn't grown by much over the past year, but that is a goal the museum staff will focus on in the next few years, Britt said.

The endowment now generates more than $60,000 a year, which goes to exhibitions, educational programs and a director's discretionary account. The budget is further augmented by a $2,500 annual gift from the Board of Visitors, a board appointed by President Jon Wefald.

Britt said he sees the potential for some significant gifts down the road, although he wouldn't say what donors were lined up for contributions. He said in two years he would like to see the annual exhibitions budget increased to $100,000.

Britt said he would also like the museum to mount fewer, but larger exhibitions in the future.

In the past year, the museum had more than a dozen exhibitions of everything from Dean Mitchell to the museum's own collection to Georgia O'Keeffe to prints.

Some of those exhibitions were underwritten by corporations, but others, like the current Wolf Kahn show, come directly from the exhibitions budget.

Britt said the Kahn show should end up costing around $14,000, which includes rental, shipping, insurance and the programming costs for honorariums. He said the upcoming show of work by William Dickerson is underwritten by the DeVore family of Wichita.

Other planned shows in the next few years include the abstract work of Clarence Morgan, set for spring 1998, and an exhibition of New York artist and alum Alan Shields' work.

Rolling Stones cancel MTV premiere concert

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — An ailing Mick Jagger meant the Rolling Stones were out and David Bowie was in for Tuesday night's premiere of MTV's new live concert program.

The Stones had been scheduled to appear on MTV's "Live From the 10 Spot," and the cancellation left network executives with no concert a day before the premiere of their new weekly show.

Jagger told MTV on Monday that his sore throat would prevent him from performing at a small theater in Port Chester. Bowie was quickly enlisted as a replacement.

"There's a risk in presenting a weekly live music series, but MTV is committed to and excited about taking that risk," spokeswoman Andrea Smith said.

It was not known if the Stones would be rescheduled.

"Live From the 10 Spot" is designed to be a plugged-in version of MTV's long-running "Unplugged" series.

Future guests include Wyclef Jean, Jane's Addiction, Counting Crows and Radiohead.

Burning to sue

MILWAUKEE — A lawyer who got burned — by the sun — is suing the company that made his sunscreen and demanding $5,000 because his vacation was ruined.

S.A. Schapiro says in his breach of warranty lawsuit that the sun protection factor 2 sunscreen "provided no prevention of sun burning," he said in his lawsuit.

Cory Nettles, a lawyer for Beiersdorf Inc. of Connecticut, said the label on the product, Nivea Sun, indicated the contents were suitable for people who rarely burn or who have deep-based tans.

"This strikes me as absolutely ridiculous," Nettles said.

David Crosby, associate professor of dermatology at the Medical College of Wisconsin, said a protection factor of 2 is "very weak."

The American Cancer Society recommends a sun screen with a factor of at least 15, Crosby said.

Schapiro declined further comment on Friday.

Making use of nose

VANCOUVER, British Columbia — His hands bound, the victim of a home invasion got help by putting his nose to the grindstone — or rather, the telephone dial.

Police did not identify the victim, a middle-aged man who was alone in the house in Surrey, a suburb southeast of Vancouver.

The man said he was awakened early Monday by a knock on the door. When he opened the door, he was knocked down, and after a brief scuffle his hands were bound with duct tape, and he was left on the basement floor. He called police by pressing the telephone buttons with his nose.

"He was still bound when we got there," Royal Canadian Mounted Police Staff Sgt. Bob Braham said.

The victim said two men in their late 20s or early 30s were in the house for about 15 minutes. Police said they took little, if anything. The man suffered only superficial injuries.

The old kidney scam

DULUTH, Minn. — She gave him her heart and her brother gave him a kidney. Now the two are suing a businessman they say duped them into providing the organ by romancing the woman and dumping her after the surgery.

Richard McNutt had one kidney and was on dialysis, in need of a transplant. He was engaged to Dorothy Zauhar — had given her a $21,500 ring and set a wedding date.

The siblings' lawsuit claims Zauhar offered to donate McNutt one of her kidneys, but couldn't because of a prior medical condition. McNutt then told her brother, John Dahl, that if he gave him one of his kidneys his sister "would have a happy life together with the defendant and that she would never want for anything," the complaint said.

Two days after he left the hospital in June 1996, McNutt broke off the engagement, it claims. What's more, he was already involved with another woman, the lawsuit says. Zauhar and Dahl are asking for more than $200,000 in damages. McNutt, a partner in the BerNutt development company, confirms he got a kidney from Dahl but denied it was a swindle.

Discrimination charges brought against university by white males

ASSOCIATED PRESS

DETROIT — A federal lawsuit filed Tuesday challenges race-based admissions at the University of Michigan, saying the policy discriminates against whites.

The class-action lawsuit seeks admission for all prospective students denied entry since 1995 because of affirmative action. It also seeks an unspecified amount of money in damages.

"We are confident that our admissions policies and procedures are legal and appropriate," Lisa Baker, university representative, said. She said the school has no plans to alter admission standards.

The reverse-discrimination suit was filed by the Center for Individual Rights, which filed a suit leading to an appeals court ruling striking down affirmative action at the University of Texas law school. The U.S. Supreme Court let the ruling stand last year.

The Supreme Court's action is directly binding only in Texas, Mississippi and Louisiana, the three states covered by the appeals court branch involved in the case. But the precedent could influence courts in other states when affirmative action at public colleges is challenged.

At the Michigan school, minorities make up about 25 percent of the 36,000 students. The school has doubled its minority enrollment over the past decade through its diversification effort.

The lawsuit names university president Lee Bollinger and his predecessor, James Duderstadt, saying both men knew or should have known that the school's affirmative policies discriminated against whites.

Though calling the policies "particularly egregious," the president of the Center for Individual Rights, Michael McDonald, said in a statement the school's standards are consistent in principle to those at many colleges and universities nationwide.

The school helps unqualified nonwhites while discriminating against qualified whites, violating their constitutional rights to equal protection and the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the lawsuit said.

"This lawsuit should serve notice on college presidents everywhere that they will be held individually liable under federal civil rights laws if they do not act now to bring their admissions policies into compliance with the law," McDonald said.

Confidential admissions policy guidelines — publicized by a University of Michigan professor who obtained them under the Freedom of Information Act — show a series of grids in which grades and standardized test scores are applied differently to whites and nonwhites.

The professor, Carl Cohen, has said that race is systematically and unconstitutionally used in admissions decisions at the university.

University officials deny that, saying the grids serve only as one set of guidelines among many and are not rigid admissions barriers.

Massachusetts universities urged to ban alcohol after recent deaths of 2 underage college students

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NORTH ADAMS, Mass. — Spurred by the alcohol-related deaths of two students, Massachusetts' Board of Higher Education on Tuesday unanimously voted to urge all 29 state colleges and universities to ban most alcohol use on campus.

> "The reality is the 21-year drinking age is not working in this country."
> • Thomas Aceto
> president of the University of Massachusetts college of liberal arts

The board of trustees at each school now has to approve the prohibition before it takes effect.

The ban would prohibit alcohol on campuses or in dormitories where any of the residents are under 21. Licensed establishments such as on-campus pubs and limited events at which everyone was 21 or older would be allowed to serve alcohol.

"On campus, we have kind of a winking, blinking, nodding acceptance of the practice that you drink when you're under age," said Aaron Spencer, a board member.

The vote was the culmination of a crackdown on alcohol abuse that followed the deaths of two students, one at the University of Massachusetts in Amherst and the other at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Scott Krueger, an 18-year-old freshman at MIT died last month of alcohol poisoning after attending a fraternity party.

Adam G. Prentice, a 21-year-old junior at Umass-Amherst, bled to death earlier this month after falling through the roof of a greenhouse while drunk.

UMass last week banned drinking at tailgate parties. The state's proposed ban would not affect MIT, which is private.

The higher education board adopted its measure Tuesday, 9-0, during a meeting.

The board, which sets policy for the 29 campuses of the state university, state colleges and community colleges, said the trustees of each campus may allow exceptions in designated places or for certain events.

It said violators should be subject to dismissal, but that campuses should provide strong alcohol education programs for students.

Some board members acknowledged that, even though the legal drinking age is 21, illegal drinking and alcohol abuse are widespread among undergraduates.

"I'd like to see no alcohol at all. I think that's impossible for us to do," said one member, Howard Jacobson. "I think we've got to be realistic."

How much of an effect a more limited policy would have is uncertain.

"The reality is that we're forcing students off campus," Thomas Aceto, president of the College of Liberal Arts, said. "The reality is the 21-year drinking age is not working in this country."

Inmates accuse sheriff, deputies of abuse in Cherokee County jail

ASSOCIATED PRESS

COLUMBUS, Kan. — Inmate Timothy Vance was strapped into a chair with handcuffs and leg irons when Cherokee County Sheriff Pat Collins and another employee allegedly began hitting and kicking him.

Two of Collins' deputies are accused of striking another Cherokee County inmate, shocking him with a stun gun, then throwing him over a fence.

Those and other details of alleged abuse were outlined Monday by Attorney General Carla Stovall's office following the arrest last week of Collins, three of his deputies, a former deputy and a jailer.

Because he is an elected official, Collins can continue his duties unless he is convicted of a crime. The future of the others was unclear, but County Attorney Sam Marsh said after an executive session of the County Commission Tuesday that any discipline is up to the sheriff. The deputies have continued working.

"I'm standing by my deputies," Collins said.

When asked whether he planned any disciplinary action, Collins said, "Discipline for what?"

When asked whether he had any comment on the charges, he replied, "I'm not guilty."

Collins, who sat in on part of the executive commission session with his lawyer, Kent Lynch, and Marsh, said he and his lawyer will review the charges and study court documents that were not available Monday because of the Columbus Day holiday. He said he would advise the commission if he makes any other decision.

The Kansas Bureau of Investigation arrested Collins and the others late Friday after a four-month investigation and an inquisition last week.

Collins was charged with 10 felonies — six counts of aggravated battery, two counts of aiding an escape and two counts of filing a fraudulent income tax return. He also was charged with nine misdemeanors, all involving mistreatment of a confined person, Stovall said.

Accusations against Collins include the following:

- stepping on an inmate's back and kicking him while he was handcuffed and lying face down on the floor.
- spraying mace in six inmates' faces while they were jailed.
- signing a tax return when he knew it listed his income as lower than it actually was.
- helping a felony inmate, Dale McDonald, escape from the Cherokee County jail on July 6, 1996, and concealing the August 1995 escape of Jamie Thompson by failing to document the incident in the jail records.

Deputies Robert Thomas, Terry Clugston and Mike Adams are accused of mistreating inmate Joseph Jones by striking him, throwing him over a fence and shocking him with a stun gun.

Charges against Thomas also include tampering with evidence, stealing a Cherokee County motor vehicle license tag and submitting false information to Labette County Community College.

Clugston is accused of tampering with evidence and submitting false information to the Cherokee County attorney to induce official action.

Former Deputy David Justice is charged with hitting inmate Roger Wells with his fist while Wells was handcuffed and submitting false information to the county attorney to induce official action.

Stovall's office joined the investigation at the request of the county attorney.

All those arrested were booked into the Labette County jail in Parsons, Kan. They were later released on bond. A first hearing on the charges has been scheduled for 1 p.m. Thursday in Cherokee County.

During the commission's executive session Tuesday, the charged deputies waited outside and said they had continued working since making bond on the charges.

Thomas, one of the deputies, said he does not know why the charges were filed against him and the others. "I'm not aware of any mistreatment of any person even though I'm charged with that," he said.

Adams said the arrests outside the courthouse during early Columbus Day activities were all show.

Collins was charged last year with 10 felony counts of misuse of public funds, but the attorney general's office is waiting for an appeals court decision in another case to determine whether the sheriff's actions were illegal.

In a telephone interview Monday, Cherokee County Commissioner Sam Weaver said he was still trying to find out information on the arrests.

"It's something you'd rather not have," he said.

Weaver is keeping an open mind about the charges.

"There are lots of rumors," he said. "I'm trying to keep that from affecting my decision making.

"You know most of these folks yourself, if you live in Cherokee County."

blocks per game in his first year playing basketball in the United States.

Vasiljevic even dropped 45 points into the bucket in a game. After his high school single-season career was finished, he nabbed the Los Angeles Times sectional player of the year award and was named one of the top 200 college prospects in the United States.

It was all starting to come together for Vasiljevic. He signed to play for K-State and left the sprawling metropolis of L.A. for the rolling plains of Kansas. But for all his success, all Vasiljevic found at K-State was frustration.

Frustration, more than anything else, sums up Vasiljevic's 1996-97 basketball season at K-State. Vasiljevic was only able to participate in four games before a stress fracture in his foot sidelined him for the season.

"I feel I could have helped if I would have been able to play," he said. "It was hard to watch."

For his trouble, Vasiljevic was granted a medical redshirt. He still has four years of eligibility.

"When he's around for his fifth year, that's when we'll really reap the dividends of having redshirted him," Coach Tom Asbury said. "That is our philosophy with all freshman redshirts."

Last season, the Cats finished last in the Big 12 at 3-13 and 10-17 overall.

As a freshman, Vasiljevic might not have been much help to the Cats. In the four games he played, Vasiljevic averaged three points and two rebounds in 34 minutes of game time.

With the season the Cats had, the 6-foot-9 Vasiljevic undoubtedly would have had access to playing time.

But where would he have played? In Australia, he said, the big guys get to handle the ball and shoot from the outside. "Over here, bigger guys are supposed to play in the paint," Vasiljevic said.

"People were surprised when they saw me handle the ball. I never thought I could have stopped it (the losing streak) by myself, but with me in the line-up we would have been one player deeper."

These days, Vasiljevic is all smiles. His stress fracture has healed. He spent the summer in Australia playing ball and he starts practice Saturday with the Cats. However, he admits he didn't weight train much.

"I didn't lift at all this summer," Vasiljevic said. "I've lost a little physical strength."

Since he has returned to K-State, Vasiljevic has been working hard in the weight room. Asbury said he is almost back to his strength of a year ago.

With practice less than a week away, Vasiljevic has one thing on his mind.

"I just want to win. That's mainly what I'm looking for," Vasiljevic said. "I want to become the best player I can be."

Kinesiology 101 no longer required

JULIE LINDAMOOD
staff reporter

No longer will body fat testing, agility testing and basic exercise be a required part of every K-State student's life.

Faculty Senate unanimously decided Tuesday night that Kinesiology 101 is no longer needed as a university-wide requirement for K-State students, Phil Anderson, faculty senate member, said.

"I believe it's important to learn lifetime survival skills and have always thought Kinesiology 101 was a valuable course," Anderson said. "It has also been one of the least popular courses in the 18 years that I've been here."

Due to years of opposition from students and faculty, the Department of Kinesiology has considered shifting the focus from teaching human movement to an academic understanding of movement, David Dzewaltowski, kinesiology department head, said.

"We can now serve a smaller number of students who want a more in-depth experience and examine that information," Dzewaltowski said.

According to Dzewaltowski, Kinesiology 101 has been replaced by Kinesiology 220, which is a three-hour class that is open to all students. Kinesiology 220 will expose students to information about the kinesiology department and field.

"We decided as a department to use our expertise to expose the group of students that want that information," Dzewaltowski said. "We're doing that in Kinesiology 220."

Dzewaltowski said the department would rather have students understand the importance of movement for daily life than require them to participate in movement.

"I think it's more important to offer a class that students can take if they want to learn more about physical fitness than to require everyone to take a generic one-hour class," Melissa Irwin, senior in graphic design, said.

Kinesiology 220 will be good for students who want more than a one-hour class, Dzewaltowski said. It will be easier to teach motivated students and for them to gain a broader knowledge of what kinesiology is.

"Unmotivated students like me aren't a help to the class," Irwin said. "We only hinder those who want to learn because we don't want to be there."

Genital herpes rates jump in young whites since 1970s

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Despite the emphasis on safe sex to prevent AIDS, genital herpes has increased fivefold since the late 1970s among white teen-agers and doubled among whites in their 20s.

In all, about one in five Americans over age 12 has the sexually transmitted infection, and most of them don't know it, the Centers for Disease and Control Prevention reported.

Dr. Michael St. Louis, who wrote the report with colleagues at the CDC, said it was surprising that herpes went up during the 1980s despite publicity about AIDS. Other sexually transmitted diseases, such as gonorrhea, declined.

He said other studies have shown that young people increased their rates of unprotected sex, premarital sex and multiple sex partners.

Phi Gamma Delta sets July 2000 as dry-house deadline

LINDSEY FORTMEYER
staff writer

The international collegiate fraternity of Phi Gamma Delta announced it will ban alcoholic beverages from all its college houses, including the chapter at K-State.

There are 125 Phi Gamma Delta chapters within the United States and Canada, all in which will soon be substance-free.

Scott Krueger, an 18-year-old Phi Gamma Delta pledge at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, died on Sept. 29 as a result of an alcohol overdose.

Phi Gamma Delta now joins Phi Delta Theta and Sigma Nu, two other international fraternities, in setting the date of July 1, 2000, for creating a substance-free house. The Phi Gamma Delta board officers made the decision for the alcohol ban on Oct. 2 of this year.

> The (alcohol) influence through the years has not been positive. Talking about an alcohol-free environment made a lot of sense.
>
> • Douglas Dittrick
> president of Phi Gamma Delta's governing board

"We were discussing all that was affecting the fraternities," Douglas Dittrick, president of Phi Gamma Delta's governing board, said.

Dittrick said alcohol was a national problem affecting young men from all 125 chapters.

"The influence through the years has not been positive," Dittrick said. "Talking about an alcohol-free environment made a lot of sense."

Dittrick said the board officers discussed the issue after doing much soul-searching, in hopes of creating a strong answer to the problem.

"Business as usual was not the right answer," Dittrick said.

The fraternities themselves did not make the decision of becoming substance-free. Dittrick said some Phi Gamma Delta fraternities wonder if the decision is appropriate, and others find it an unnecessarily strong step.

"There are 6,300 undergraduate members in the Phi Gamma Delta fraternity. We are not able to pull opinions from all of them," Dittrick said. He said the governing board takes the higher leadership role over the fraternities.

The deadline for the year 2000 was set by the governing board to allow discussion for three years to help eliminate the problem.

Dean suspends SMSU fraternity after discussion

ASSOCIATED PRESS

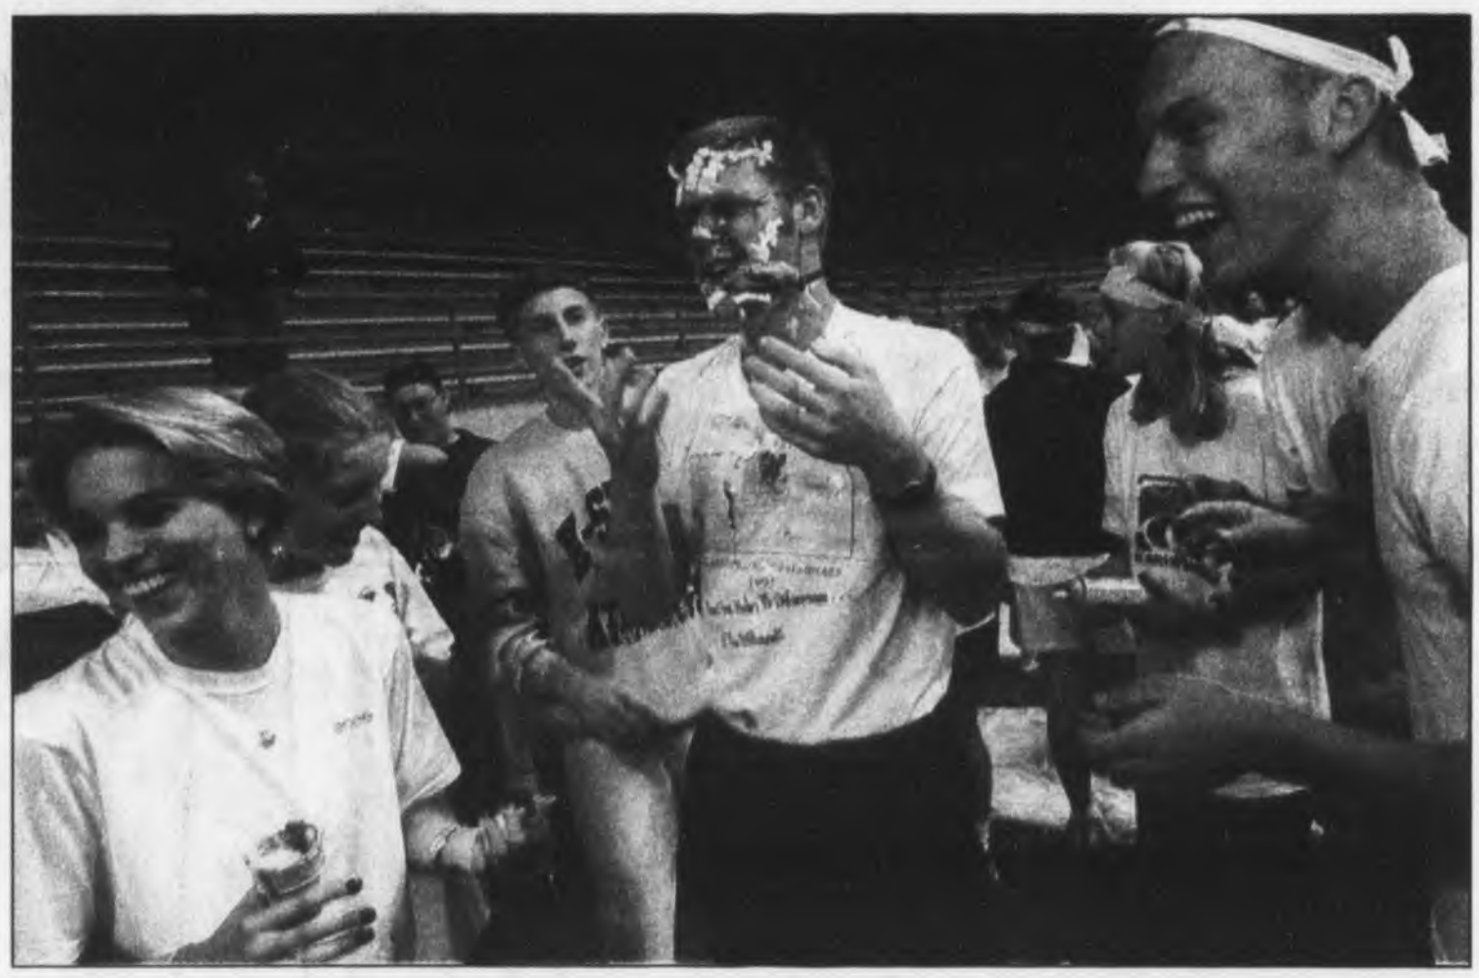
SPRINGFIELD, Mo. — The way the local Delta Chi fraternity sees it, members try to do the right thing. But sometimes they screw up, and the university ought to cut them some slack.

Unfortunately for Delta Chi, that reasoning prompts a long, raucous laugh from Southwest Missouri State University's dean of student life and development. Meanwhile, the university has suspended the fraternity and launched an investigation that could ultimately end with Delta Chi's banishment from campus.

"The poor guys. Am I mistreating them? I am, aren't I? I don't know if I can hold my head up in public," Bob Glenn, SMSU's dean of student life, said Wednesday after he quit laughing.

Then, turning serious, he added: "I think we've cut them all the breaks we possibly can. ... They are certainly an aberration on this campus."

The suspension was issued after a weekend party that Glenn said ended with police issuing citations for serving alcohol to a minor and creating a public disturbance.



The fraternity's president, Scott Hopkins, didn't immediately return a call for comment Wednesday. But in an interview with the Springfield News-Leader, he argued that police should be cracking down instead on stores that sell liquor to minors.

"It's not our business to be security guards," said another member, Matthew St. John. "We do the best we can, but sometimes we screw up."

Glenn said the latest trouble occurred Saturday while the fraternity was under investigation

"IT'S AN OPPORTUNITY FOR MORE PEOPLE TO GET INVOLVED WITH THE GAME AND TO GET EXCITED FOR IT."

Love it or hate it, this week's activities draw a crowd to celebrate

STORY BY ANGELA BUCCIGROSSI • PHOTO BY CLIF PALMBERG

Homecoming happens only once a year and the feelings it evokes are often strong, but not always universal. The week's activities are loved and anticipated by some groups of students and disliked by others.

Some students enjoy participating in Homecoming because of the opportunity it provides to hang out with friends and get to know new group members better, said Sara Reser, member of Kappa Kappa Gamma sorority.

"I think it's a good opportunity to really get to know everyone because you get to spend lots of time together. Especially the new members, because it's the first opportunity you get to have an extended period of time working with them," Reser said.

Most organizations participating in the Homecoming competitions have been paired up with other groups to help students get to meet more people.

"Homecoming is just getting to meet a lot of new people in different organizations," said Cade Keenan, Interfraternity Council public relations officer.

Besides the friends, some students said they also think Homecoming helps to inspire spirit and excitement for K-State and gets everyone ready for the weekend's football game.

"It's an opportunity for more people to get involved with the game and to get excited for it," said Joe Bob Clements, junior in public relations and defensive end for the K-State football team.

The competition of the game and the activities between living groups makes Homecoming an exciting event for some students.

"It's the thrill of competition. I like to think I'm working really hard so my Homecoming group can shine, so we can come out on top," Keenan said.

For some, winning the competition has even become a tradition. The Strong Complex team, made up of Boyd, Van Zile and Putnam Hall members, has won the residence hall division for several years.

"It's a time to try a keep our reign going. We've won the past three years and we want to make it a fourth," said Shannon Schaffer, senior in hotel and restaurant management and resident in Strong complex.

While some enjoy the competition others feel it causes school division.

"Homecoming is supposed to be about the school coming together, rather than the division of it," said Jason Bucher, sophomore in accounting and finance. "It seems as if it's been taking away from us and given to the greek system."

K-State alumnus uses his plane to promote K-State
SOARING WITH PRIDE

JOHN HENDERSON
senior staff writer

A K-State alumnus will return to Manhattan tomorrow, flying the Wildcat-clad airplane he built with the help of a friend.

John George, who earned his bachelor's degree in agricultural engineering in 1969 and his master's degree in the same subject one year later, is coming to visit his son, Jerry, and daughter, Jonna, both students at K-State.

At K-State, George bought his first plane, a Cessna 120, with the help of Pat Murphy and two other partners. Murphy and George got their pilots' licenses at about the same time.

Murphy, now an agricultural engineer for the K-State extension service, said he hasn't flown in a long time. The Cessna was sold to a buyer from Wichita, and he hasn't seen it since.

George started work on his new plane, a Lancair 360, in April 1995, and spent 18 months with the help of Don Pearsall before it was done.

The plane's construction is mostly fiberglass, weighing only 1,200 pounds.

The lightweight design, 180-horsepower engine and retractable landing gear allows it to scream through the air at a maximum speed of 220 mph.

The pilot uses four computers built into the Lancair to fly. One provides autopilot, one gathers air-speed data and rate of climb and one is for the global positioning system (GPS) that aids navigation. Another displays full-color maps and navigational charts with the plane graphically depicted at the center.

"This way, I don't have to keep folding and unfolding maps," he said. "This does it all for me."

George is head of Agricultural Engineering Associates, based in Uniontown, a small co-op farming community just south of US-54 between Iola and Ft. Scott, in southeast Kansas.

KCI airport announces $9 million in improvements for anniversary

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Kansas City International Airport officials say $9 million worth of improvements will kick off the celebration of the airport's 25th anniversary beginning this month.

The first phase of improvements announced Tuesday calls for new light installation and ceiling asbestos removal throughout the facility. There also will be several additions to the customs area: two larger international arrival gates to replace the existing one, two new passenger loading bridges and expanded baggage carousels.

Ray Anderson, director of the Kansas City Aviation Department, said KCI has reached record travel numbers in the past year. For the first time ever, the airport saw more than a million passengers arriving and departing in the month of June. That pattern continued through August, when traffic jumped by 6.6 percent over August 1996.

The first set of improvements will span 18 months — six months per terminal. Work will occur between 10 p.m. and 6 a.m. to eliminate inconveniences to visitors.

Computer giant to invest in TCI to ensure company's success

NEW YORK — Microsoft Corp. might invest as much as $1 billion in one of the country's largest cable-operating companies, The Wall Street Journal reported today.

Microsoft executives are negotiating a possible deal with Tele-Communications Inc., sources told the Journal.

An influx of Microsoft dollars could give TCI the money it will need to pay for the next generation of digital cable boxes, which are expected to provide high-speed Internet connections and access to hundreds of digital cable channels.

Microsoft executives have said penetrating the living room market for consumer electronic devices, particularly television, will be crucial to the company's long-term success.

The Redmond, Wash.-based computing giant is worried that any rival operating system that becomes widely used in consumer electronics could eventually compete with its Windows PC operating system, the Journal said.

Boxer denied $25 million by jury in lawsuit with ex-champion

NEW YORK — A jury ruled Wednesday afternoon that boxer Mitch "Blood" Green had provoked Mike Tyson into a 1988 Harlem street fight but still ordered the ex-heavyweight champion to pay Green $45,000.

The panel, after six hours of deliberations intwo days, awarded Green the money for injuries suffered in the brawl outside a 24-hour clothing store. But it refused to grant punitive damages. Green was asking for $25 million.

Green suffered a broken nose, a five-stitch cut over the bridge of his nose and a swollen left eye. He appeared upset after the verdict, standing ringed by four court officers in the courthouse hallway and offering no response.

Tyson left the court without commenting. The jury began its deliberations Tuesday afternoon, and returned its verdict early Wednesday afternoon.

At the request of Tyson's lawyer, state Justice Elliott Wilk also issued a 30-day order of protection requiring Green to stay away from Tyson.

Corrections CLARIFICATIONS

In a story in Wednesday's Collegian titled "Faculty Senate expresses concern about periodicals," there was an error. The task force recommended cutting $100,000 from monographs (books), not from scholarly journals. It also recommended $225,000 be reallocated from other university resources including further print periodical subscription reductions, open faculty lines, OOE and/or graduate teaching assistant positions. The Collegian regrets the error.

In Wednesday's paper, Sun Dee Mills' column, titled "Air Jordan deflates columnist's ideals," had a mistake. North Carolina's mascot is the Tar Heel, not the Blue Devil. The Collegian regrets the error.

Lecturer explores alternatives to prison

BRANDI HERTIG
staff reporter

A 17-year-old in Oregon, who was tried as an adult in an armed robbery case, won't get out of prison until he's 24 under the state's recently revised Tough on Juvenile Crime law.

Malcolm C. Young, executive director of "The Sentencing Project," is concerned about what kind of citizen the American public can expect after the prisoner is released when spending seven of his most formative years locked up with adult inmates.

Young discussed why the boy from Oregon, or most people convicted of crimes, would not be helped by being thrown in prison and explained the alternatives to typical crime solutions during the Lou Douglas Lecture Series on Tuesday.

"It's time to take strong action, and we as a country need to revise drastically our approach to criminal justice," Young said.

Young placed part of the blame of inflated incarceration rates in recent years on the Bush administration's War on Drugs.

He also noted that between 1983 and 1993, the number of people in prison on drug charges increased six-fold.

"The impact on African-Americans and Hispanics in this country, which has been documented by my office, was immense," he said.

Calling upon findings from a 1990 report, Young said one in four young African-Americans were in trouble with the criminal justice system. Five years later that ratio had become one in three, he said.

"The nation knows these numbers — we know what we're doing to African-Americans in the correctional systems," he said. "And we keep on doing it."

Young picked apart several alternatives to prison and jail sentencing, including community corrections, sentencing guidelines, probation, drug court, and treatment and prevention, presenting the pros and cons of each.

Citing statistics from an evaluation done by the Rand Corp., Young illustrated how, if money were channeled properly into prevention and incentives rather than building new prisons, fewer crimes would be committed.

Rand used a hypothetical $1 million and studied the results of putting that money into different programs.

Young gave three examples of the possible ways of using the money Rand looked into.

First, if the money were used to build more prisons, the study showed that there would be 60 fewer crime cases each year.

Second, if the money went toward teaching parents of young children how to be good parents, that number would jump to 160.

Lastly, if the money were used to provide inner city high school students with the chance of a college education, the number of crimes each year would decrease by 258.

Young said in schools where such monetary incentives are in place, students are more likely to get their diplomas.

"In those schools, the completion rates for those students were down from less than 20 percent, to more than 80 percent. There is unrefutable evidence that alternatives work," he said. "Of course they work. They can work, they do work, and they can work better."

All you need to know.

Radon poisoning No. 2 cause of lung cancer

JENNI EVANS
staff reporter

Each year in the United States, exposure to indoor radon gas causes thousands of preventable lung cancer deaths, according to American Lung Association literature.

The goal of Radon Action Week, which is Sunday-Oct. 25, is to increase public awareness about the second-leading cause of lung cancer.

"What we'll be doing that week is promoting radon as a health hazard. Our goal is to make all Kansans aware of the fact that they should test for radon. It is the most effective way to prevent lung cancer," said Sue Henke, public information director for the American Lung Association.

Radon is a gas that cannot be seen, and it is odorless and tasteless. It occurs during the natural breakdown of uranium that is found in the earth's rock and soil.

It enters a home by coming up through the soil and rocks surrounding a home and seeps through cracks in the foundation, floor-wall joints, loose fitting pipe penetrations and in exposed soil, such as a sump pump.

"Radon comes up, and you breathe it in and it gets into your lungs because it's a very fine particle. If it does its final decay there, that little burst of radiation can have damaging effects on cell structure. It can cause lung cancer," Henke said.

When exposed to radon over a long period of time, someone's chances of developing lung cancer increase.

"This is not something that's going to happen overnight," Henke said of the possible development of lung cancer. However, she said, it is fairly easy and inexpensive to test for radon in your home.

The American Lung Association suggests that testing should be done during the winter or summer months when windows and doors are shut.

The testing kits are left out for four to seven days and then mailed for testing. If the level of radon in your home is four or higher, the house should be mitigated.

Mitigation is the process of increasing the airflow out of the house.

"They (houses) have a negative pressure so they pull air into them. Whatever the house is sitting on, especially things that are airborne, will be pulled into the house," Henke said.

"The most direct and easiest ways to reduce radon in a home is through active soil depressurization system," said Bruce Snead of the Kansas Industrial Extension Services.

The soil suction system consists of a fan placed in the attic or outside the living area of the house, which is attached to a sealed piping system that runs to just beneath the foundation. This fan pulls the radon out from below the house and to the outside.

The cost of installing the mitigation system costs approximately $1,000. The American Lung Association recommends that people mitigating their homes consult an EPA-listed or state-certified contractor.

All homes should be tested for radon because radon levels can vary from home to home. A neighboring home might have a high level of radon and some homes might have very low levels. Some buildings have been known to have higher levels on one side than on the other, Henke said.

Many real estate transactions require that a home be tested for dangerous levels of radon before purchase.

Precautions can also be taken when building a new home. Certified contractors can now use radon resistant techniques when laying down a home's foundation.

"Radon is a naturally occurring environmental risk. The only way to know if you have high levels of radon is to test for it. It's easy and inexpensive,"Snead said.

Dr. Seuss Poetry Reading to feature works by students along with verses from other children's books authors

JOHN FRANSON
staff writer

A Dr. Seuss Poetry Reading will be at 8 tonight at Java Espresso & Bakery. Union Program Council is sponsoring the event.

Participants are welcome to read their own works and that of others, as well as those of Dr. Seuss. Attendees may also just listen to the readings. Participants can read any length poem as long as it is not excessive.

"Everybody's going to get a turn," Susan Vering, UPC Arts Committee chair, said.

Tonight is UPC's first poetry reading this year. Last year, UPC sponsored poetry readings every month, but this is the first time the event has been given a theme.

"It was just one of the ideas that the committee came up with ,and we thought this would be a lot of fun," Vering said. "This year we thought a different theme each time would be good."

If turnout to the event is high, Vering said, UPC plans to organize a themed poetry reading each month. UPC is taking suggestions for future themes.

The late author Theodor Geisel, also known as Dr. Seuss, was known for his many childrens' books, most famously "Green Eggs and Ham" and "The Cat in the Hat," which featured a special style of nonsense rhyming.

While Geisel wrote mainly for children, many adults admire his works for their gentleness and for their universal quality.

"Everybody can relate to him," Vering said. "He's not intimidating as a poet."

UPC is expecting greater attendance than last year's readings, because of the appeal of Dr. Seuss.

"We're expecting quite a bit more," Vering said. "There's been a lot of good response."

Vering said the reading will last at least an hour. There is no charge for the event.

Kudos to Faculty Senate for dropping silly Kinesiology 101 class

If you hated gym in high school, you had to hate it for eight weeks in college, too.

Fortunately, K-State students don't have to worry about that anymore.

Faculty Senate decided Tuesday night that K-Staters no longer need Kinesiology 101 to graduate. The Department of Kinesiology also replaced the class with Kinesiology 220, a three-hour class, open to all students, which will cover information about the kinesiology department and field.

Kinesiology 101 was a one-hour course that met for eight weeks. Almost all the people enrolled in it had spent at least 18 years developing their fitness habits, or lack thereof. An eight-week class was certainly not going to change those habits, so it was a pointless requirement.

If people went home every day after school, ate Cheetos and watched "Thundercats" from kindergarten until the end of high school, eight weeks will not change their habits. If they do change their habits, they will probably have to be motivated to do so by a force more powerful than Kinesiology 101.

The responsibility to teach healthy habits needs to fall to our elementary schools, middle schools and junior and senior high schools. If they have failed at providing adequate physical education, that won't be fixed by a one-hour college requirement.

If people played tennis and basketball and ran track in high school, there's a good chance they play intramurals or work out now.

So Faculty Senate has done everyone a favor by dropping this requirement. The kinesiology department has done everyone a favor by creating Kinesiology 220.

Now professors can teach students who want a broader knowledge of physical fitness. The students who choose to take the class will be interested in the subject and motivated to learn about it. And they can can do that, rather than getting the Kinesiology 101 information that was watered down for the masses.

CHECK OUT THE NEWS LATELY?

It seems that news of the weird is proliferating every aspect of our society

VIEWPOINT

TERRY WELCH

TERRY WELCH is a junior in radio-television. You can send your e-mail to Terry at tlw1915@ksu.edu.

I just can't do it.

Usually, I have little problem finding a topic to rant about in this column, some issue that catches in my craw like a tooth-lodged popcorn kernel on a first movie date, but this week it's not going to happen.

It's not that there's nothing to write about, heaven knows. It's that there's just too damn much weird stuff going on. My head is swimming.

In case you've been too busy with your own little slice of the universe to worry about the world in general, let's review some of the things you might have missed.

The Promise Keepers had a huge rally a week and a half ago. The self-proclaimed apolitical group dragged tens of thousands of its members to that mecca of people who want to avoid politics, Washington, D.C., an act that sent me scrambling to find a grain of salt large enough to take their promises with.

Among the group's tenets is the admonition that men need to "reclaim" leadership from their wives. (A scene I imagine occurred in several thousand homes across America last Monday: Husband: "Honey, I'm home from the Promise Keepers rally to reclaim leadership of the household." Wife: "You got it. I'll be at my sister's.")

I know that in the future, when Promise Keepers rule the world, I will probably be put to the thumb screws for doubting them. That's fine as long as none of them tries to hug me when I cry about it.

On another religious front, Israel's Mossad tried to kill Khaled Meshal, political leader of Hamas. The assassination attempt deeply irked King Hussein of Jordan, because the attack took place in his country. So Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu began releasing some of Israel's Jordanian prisoners to make nice with Hussein.

The weird part is that here we are at the end of the 20th century and as far as I've heard, none of the players has yet said, "Hey, maybe assassination isn't the best way to achieve better Jew-Arab relations." So far, the only comment has been Netanyahu's statements that roughly equate to the street court basketball slang, "My bad."

Back home to more solid — and sordid — ground, depositions began this week in the Paula Jones sexual harassment case against President Clinton. First up, Jones' mother is to give information as to what her daughter told her about the incident. As of the date of this writing, I don't know what she said, but if she says her daughter rushed to her and told her that a prominent political figure showed her his penis, she's probably lying. That kind of mother-daughter openness only occurs in New England, where being fondled by a Kennedy has been part of a woman's rite of passage for 40 years.

Speaking of political figures dangling in the wind, Vice President Al Gore is a hair's breadth away from getting an independent counsel sicced on him by Attorney General Janet Reno. As a Democrat, but I hope an honest one, I hope Al is smart enough to come clean and walk away for two reasons — one, because I don't want him screwing up the 2000 election and two, because if it gets messy, Reno could pop his face inside out. No one wants that.

In news even closer to home, a recent study by The Associated Press found that 44 percent of college students are binge drinkers, but the number jumps to 86 percent for fraternity residents. Combine that with the fact — given in a previous Collegian article — that 75 percent of K-State's leadership roles are filled by members of the greek system and it might explain that whole Paula Jones/Bill Clinton thing we talked about earlier. Luckily, for the trial lawyers of America, it appears that the leaders of tomorrow will also have access to Rohypnol. That should keep things interesting for a while.

It's sad, but this truly is just scratching the surface of the madness. I still haven't mentioned Marv Albert; the Cassini Space Probe; the rumors that the Jesse Helms/William Weld dispute was really a lovers' quarrel; the Hooters sex-discrimination case; Andrew Morton and the Princess Diana Death Cult; Time magazine's cover story on Buddhism that ran with a picture of Brad Pitt (?!); the fact that Gwyneth Paltrow and Martha Stewart are both still single; or even John Denver.

You know, I don't think I can take it. It's all too weird for me.

What I need is just to calm down, turn off CNN, get snuggled up in a blanket and binge drink espresso with shots of Rohypnol while mass-mailing love letters to Martha Stewart, Gwyneth Paltrow and Marv Albert.

Weird? Maybe.

But it keeps me from trying to assassinate anybody.

IT'S TIME TO LEARN HOW TO PACK

A PROPERLY PACKED SUITCASE CAN MAKE TRAVEL EASIER

VIEWPOINT

MAJED KHAN

MAJED KHAN is a graduate student in electrical engineering. You can send e-mail to Majed at majed@ksu.edu.

There must be people who never take luggage when traveling. After checking into a hotel, they just go out and buy whatever they need.

My travel budget never includes a new-clothing allowance, alas, and I don't pack from the Goodwill bin because there is a correlation between the way you look and the way you're treated, I've found. Still, I appreciate both approaches, because they concern a need every seasoned traveler feels — the need to pack lightly.

In the broadest sense, there is freedom and devotion in traveling without an abundance of material goods.

Honestly, though, I don't travel light for lightness's sake. I just hate to pay for taxis — which means I've got to be able to shoulder my own bags, or run with them, down long train platforms, city blocks and rutted country lanes.

This has led me to some extreme behavior, such as weight training to stay in prime traveling shape, and carrying my packed luggage up and down the street in front of my apartment, just to make sure I can manage it.

Because I travel so much, it seems as if I'm always packing — a process that actually starts when I begin researching a trip.

As I read guidebooks, I keep a running list of items to pack as dictated by the character and climate of my destination. Obviously, a coat is wise for Siberia, and a city tour of London requires gear different from that for a hike in the Swiss Alps.

Regarding myself, basically, this involves making sure I'm in good physical shape and have the resources to stay that way. I find out whether I'll need to get any inoculations or take special precautions by contacting the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention in Atlanta (which has efficient fax information services).

Between dieting and doctor visits, I shop. It's wise not to postpone this until the last minute, when by some perverse law of nature you can never find the things on your list. Besides, I enjoy cruising luggage shops and sporting goods stores, where I sometimes find just the item required and am always astounded by the variety of travel gadgets on the market, from miniature steam irons to packaged toilet-seat covers.

The third is my favorite bag. It looks quite smart and can often be carried on airplanes, though I usually check it. The bag lacks a lock, so I use my padlock and never pack anything valuable inside. It holds precisely a week's worth of clothes, which is all I ever take, even on longer trips.

When all my clothes are dirty, I go to a coin laundry or wash fast-drying items in a hotel sink, using shampoo. I've learned what a week's worth of clothes includes by assessing my gear while unpacking after a trip — anything I didn't use never gets taken again. My seven-day clothing allotment is made up of two pairs of pants, T-shirts, running clothes, two pairs of shoes, a sweatshirt, socks and a raincoat.

I don't pack items that wrinkle. To get all this into my bag, I apply pressure and fill every empty space. To me, density counts, not neatness. I never leave extra space for souvenirs because I know that dirty clothes have less volume than clean ones.

KRIS EMMONS/Collegian

I avoid packing my bulkiest items, such as hiking boots, sweaters and coats, by wearing them on the plane.

Generally, I check just one piece of luggage, and take a small backpack or carry-on aboard the plane. It contains valuables such as my guidebooks, camera and film (stored in a pouch that protects it from X-rays) and a collection of items I might need en route, such as note pads, pens, glasses and a fresh T-shirt.

I try not to let it out of my sight but am comforted to know that even if I lost it I'd still have my valuables strapped around my waist in a fanny pack.

On the way to the bus or subway, or when I get into a taxi for the airport, I slow down briefly to make sure I know exactly where all my essential items are.

And no matter how hard I try not to, I almost always leave my toothbrush behind.

'A Lie of the Mind' review poorly researched, written

Editor,

During the rehearsal process for Sam Shepard's "A Lie of the Mind," the cast and crew often commented on the absurdity of the play. Therefore, I shouldn't have been so surprised after reading the review given to the performance. Nonetheless, the careless manner in which the reviewer constructed her article and commented on the play struck me as particularly absurd.

I wondered after reading the review if the journalist cared to read the articles printed in The Manhattan Mercury in reference to the production. One was an article on David Centers, the technical director for the show.

In it, he talks about his concept for the set of the show — shying away from realism and leaning toward the abstract. Albeit an interpretation, I questioned whether the reviewer saw the same set when she commented that the set struck her as very real.

The other was an article written by the director of the show, Lew Shelton, who has extensively researched Sam Shepard's life and writing. The reviewer could have benefited from this article, also.

Another part of the review of which I took exception dealt with her criticism of the actors. She mentioned that at key moments in the play the actors did not relate well with each other.

I wished she would have had the conviction to specify her criticism. The very nature of the characters dictates that they do not communicate well with each other, so I doubt she was referring to that.

I do not mind criticism of my performance as long as it is given intelligently and with the intent of insight.

The last section of the review is what causes me to seriously doubt the validity of everything else written. The reviewer showed an audacity that was both tremendous and embarrassing at the same time. She felt it necessary to give Shepard writing advice.

This is the Shepard who has starred in numerable motion pictures, including "The Right Stuff."

It is OK and, I would say, necessary, to critique well-known writers at an educational institution. To do so, however, one should exhibit a personal integrity and a respect for the author's intention in his work. The reviewer lacked both in her review.

K-State trivia to test students' knowledge of university during Purple Prizes Day

ANGELA BUCCIGROSSI
staff reporter

Students might be wishing they knew a few more facts about K-State for today's Purple Prizes Day in the K-State Student Union.

The new Homecoming activity is centered around trivia about K-State.

"They'll be K-State trivia questions for students to answer. If they answer right, they will get their name in the pot for a drawing at the end of the day," said Heather Lansdowne, assistant director of alumni programs.

All prizes will be K-State paraphernalia, such as T-shirts, hats and even a football, Lansdowne said.

The idea behind the new activity was to have Homecoming events throughout the week for the entire university, not just the greek organizations.

"In the past couple of years Homecoming has been primarily an activity between living groups. We wanted to have one thing every day for all students," she said.

The activity is sponsored by the All-University Homecoming Committee and is staffed by the Kansas State University Association of Residence Halls. KSUARH members are helping by working at the trivia table, explaining the event and helping students register.

KSUARH members are helping with the new activity because they wanted to get more involved with Homecoming, said Trent Schaaf, president of the KSUARH.

"The residence halls participate in all the events, but we haven't been active in a lot of the helping out with the organization. I wanted to get us more involved in the planning and implementation of activities," he said.

Schaaf said the All-University Homecoming Committee wants the activity to increase interest in the ambassador elections.

"We wanted to try to get people into the Union to get more participation for the elections," Schaaf said.

The new activity is also being tried at K-State-Salina. They will even be using the same set of trivia questions, Lansdowne said.

"They're working really hard to make their Homecoming similar to our Homecoming here," she said.

Organizers on both campuses said they are excited to try the new trivia event.

"We're just excited to offer more activities for all the students," Lansdowne said.

The activity takes place today from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. on the first floor of the Union next to the Stateroom.

Pan-Hellenic Council sponsors Greek Week events to unify groups

CATHY BACH
staff reporter

The K-State Pan-Hellenic Council is sponsoring Greek Week, a week-long series of events designed to unify the historically black greek organizations on campus.

The Pan-Hellenic Council is the governing body of all historically black fraternities and sororities.

Verneta White, secretary of the Pan-Hellenic Council, said she didn't expect so many people to come to the events.

"There was not a whole lot of publicity," White said.

White said the spirit of unity increased participation.

"As far as current greek membership, we're really trying to do things together," White said.

White said there were 20 to 25 greeks at each function. She said she thinks the event could become tradition in years to come.

> We're creating stronger bonds with the individual organizations as well as each other. Our internal goal is to support each other and have each other's back.
> • Verneta White
> secretary of the Pan-Hellenic Council

A purpose of the week's events is to create unity between all black greek organization members and to eliminate unfriendly competition.

"We're creating stronger bonds with the individual organizations as well as each other," White said. "Our internal goal is to support each other and have each other's back."

Dwan Gardner, president of the Pan-Hellenic Council, said the idea was originally hers and the rest of the council members added to it.

"The goal of Greek Week is to unite the greeks, and to exhibit that we're active while also enriching the lives of African-American students," Gardner said.

She said there are many misconceptions about greek activities and greek life on campus and some of the events were designed to dispel these ideas.

Daneeka Marshall, member of the Alpha Kappa Alpha sorority, said the "Meet the Greeks" forum on Tuesday answered those questions, stated the goals of black greeks and told students how to join.

"The purpose of this is to bring black greeks together to unify us, to show nongreeks that it's not competition and to respect each other as greeks," Marshall said.

Gardner said the week's events are not Homecoming-related, but this just happened to be the best week to have the events.

The events included the display of black-greek paraphernalia and art on Monday, the forum on Tuesday and a potluck for greeks only on Wednesday. Events remaining include community service for the Boys and Girls Club of Manhattan, a dance on Friday and another dance and social on Saturday.

All events are free except for the dance on Saturday. Proceeds from the dance will go toward a scholarship for African-American students.

KORRI HALL, junior in elementary education, dances with Kez Demby at a soul food potluck dinner Wednesday night at the Ecumenical Campus Ministry student center.

Plans for new park reach final form

DAVID FAIRBANKS
city editor

City park plan proposed

Richard Allen, Park Planner presented the City Commission with a detailed, finalized plan for the Northeast Park to be put in Northview.

MIKE ENGELHARDT/Collegian

In a City Commission policy session meeting on Tuesday night, Richard Allen, park planner for the Manhattan Department of Parks and Recreation, presented the finalized master plan for Manhattan's Northeast Park.

The new park, to be built in the Northview area, will be bordered by the Dix addition to the west, agricultural land to the east, open land to the north and the abandoned Blue River channel to the south.

The 80-acre tract of land will combine everything the public wants, Allen said. It will be a community park combined with the elements of sports, neighborhood and natural beauty.

The park will be split into three separate areas. The north end will be the active area where the playgrounds and sports fields will be built. To the south will be the passive area where the natural restored prairie will be, and in the middle of it all will be the proposed community building and nature center.

Allen said the great thing about this park is that the public designed it. Parks and Recreation met extensively with Manhattan residents, organizing 12 public meetings and producing a number of amended plans.

"We started out by having the people make their wish lists, then through the process of elimination they all decided on what they wanted," Allen said.

This $3.2 million project will be home to a number of features including three shelters, two restrooms, two soccer fields, two baseball fields, two playgrounds, three tennis courts, maintenance buildings, an amphitheater, trails, roadways and a Linear Park connection, he said.

Allen also gave maintenance projections for each phase of the park beginning with a first-year cost of $104,000.

Allen also said there are a number of ways the park could get funding. Grants, donations, a bond referendum and the capital improvements program were a few possibilities that he mentioned.

After the presentation, Mayor Bruce Snead addressed the commission and the public.

"This has been a terrific public process and has resulted in an excellent plan, a plan which I am in favor of," he said.

His feelings were shared by Commissioner Steve Hall.

"This has been an excellent community project and everyone should be complimented on it. We should dedicate ourselves to pursuing this," he said.

As the meeting closed, City Manager Gary D. Greer said the master plan would be brought to the City Commission for approval in the near future.

Snead said it should happen by the end of the year.

spirited and be better than everybody else, not about being proud of K-State, he said.

Other students are uncertain what the meaning is behind Homecoming.

"It must mean a lot to some people because of all the time they put into it — signing up for everything and working on the float and the banner, but I'm not really sure what it means," said Dustin Unruh, freshman in electronic journalism.

While not everyone feels the same way about Homecoming, most just want to have fun during the week.

David Werner, sophomore in architectural engineering and member of Lambda Chi Alpha, said he feels the best part about Homecoming is the chance to have fun with all the events.

"It's fun to do the float and body building and just hang out with everybody and get excited for the game. It's just fun," he said.

Freshmen adjust to Big 12 play, sharing point guard postition

SUN DEE MILLS
sports editor

Two players. One position. Four years.

These are numbers that could add up to success at the Wildcat women's basketball team's pivotal point guard position.

Freshmen Kim Woodlee and Dee DeShay start practice this weekend at the same position, but both bring different games to the court.

"Dee is a more explosive, penetrating point guard," Coach Deb Patterson said. "She has more flash to her game. Kim is a more traditional player and a good three-point shooter. She's like the icing on the cake."

Senior guard Brit Jacobson said while both players have a nice shot, they have some court adjustments to make.

"Dee maybe needs to get a little more control," Jacobson said, "whereas Kim maybe needs to get a little more out of control."

Woodlee is in the process of recovering from knee surgery for problems with a torn meniscus and won't be practicing at full speed for two to three weeks, but she hopes to use that time to perfect some things.

"Hopefully, I'll be more of a stronger shooter," Woodlee said. "That's my goal."

DeShay, meanwhile, will be working on other things.

"I want to get down that pass that Coach Kamie (Ethridge) has," DeShay said. "It's really great."

Woodlee and DeShay agreed that Ethridge, who captained the 1986 University of Texas national championship team and won a gold medal with the United States team at the Olympics in 1988, is one of the best guards to ever play the game.

The two players played the off-guard position in high school, and will be making the switch to point this season. A new position is challenging enough, but making this change in the Big 12 adds a new twist altogether.

"Playing a two guard in high school and moving to point guard in Division-I ball means dealing with pressure from baseline to baseline when you've never had it before," Woodlee said. "It's going to be a learning experience, but I think if anybody can teach us, Coach Kamie can."

They said they can't wait to learn the game from her and the rest of the coaching staff. DeShay said the staff and the team's success last season was the reason she came to K-State.

"The game that got me was when they beat Texas (last season)," DeShay said. "I was at home and heard it on the radio."

The Cats were down by one point when then senior Missy Decker knocked down two free throws with no time remaining on the clock. It marked the first time the 1996 Cats defeated a ranked opponent.

DeShay said her game is more of a finesse game, something the coaches are trying to get out of her game and tighten up.

"She possesses all the skills necessary to be a great point guard," Patterson said. "She has good quickness, a strong handle and the ability to shoot and score."

Woodlee said she loves to guard against DeShay's quickness when they play pick-up games.

"It's really good to play against Dee, 'cause I can see stuff that she does better than I do, and it helps us to see our weaknesses," Woodlee said. "It's good for me to guard somebody like that, because it gets me moving quicker."

Patterson said she wasn't looking to one player to assume a permanent starting role; she plans to play them based on the opponent and the immediate needs on the court in each game.

"We do anticipate them splitting time at the position," Patterson said. "They're finding a personality and a style and the extent to which they can make things go. Then, they'll possibly earn that position."

Neither player cares who's on the starting lineup, and they look forward to learning the game these next four years together.

"College is all about competition," DeShay said. "Either off the bench or as a starter, I don't care. All I want to do is contribute."

BREAKAWAYBACK

A&M running back brings speed, strength to field

SUN DEE MILLS
sports editor

Besides Kansas, Texas produced the most Wildcat football players on the 1997 roster. Eighteen Cats migrated north to join Coach Bill Snyder's team.

Texas A&M's sophomore running back Dante Hall said the Lone Star state grows football players by the yard.

"There's a huge high school football tradition down here," Hall said. "Here, California and Florida are the three biggest states for football, probably."

Hall graduated from Nimitz High School in Houston and decided to remain close to home for college. And after his first year's performance as an Aggie, A&M fans should be glad he did.

In 1996, Hall set an A&M record by returning 43 punts for 543 yards, and both these totals led the nation. He led the Big 12 in punt-return average, with 13.3 yards per return. He also rushed for 642 yards and three touchdowns on 92 attempts, averaging 7 yards per carry.

These accomplishments earned Hall Big 12 Freshman of the Year honors and he was named to the All-Big 12 first team. This season, Hall is a Butkus Award candidate, but he didn't even know that.

"I really don't care about the award things," Hall said. "If the team is winning games, and those come along in the process, then that is great. But my main goal is to win games."

Winning is something the 1997 Aggies are doing much of. Hall's team is 5-0 as they come into Manhattan this Saturday to play what Aggie Coach R.C. Slocum calls "the best team we've played so far."

Hall doesn't necessarily agree.

"Yes, it's a big game," he said, "but it's not like it's a do-or-die game. However, we both (teams) do want to win this game."

Like any undefeated team, the Aggies would love to leave K-State with no blemish on their win-loss record. But the Cats, who are at 4-1 after dropping a game to No. 2 Nebraska, think the Aggies have another agenda.

"After last year, they probably want to beat us at home here," sophomore defensive tackle Damion McIntosh said. "They want to prove they're one of the top teams, and we want to prove we're one of the top teams."

Hall said the Aggies harbor no ill will from last year's 23-20 defeat at Kyle Field.

"There are no negative feelings here," Hall said. We have no one to blame for losing except ourselves. But we look forward to playing them again."

Snyder said the entire team provided challenges to the Cats, but as far as Hall and his fellow running backs were concerned, Snyder said they'd have to pray a lot.

Hall

"He is very difficult to defend," Snyder said. "He can hurt you anywhere. If one person gets out of position, he can get away from you."

The Aggie offense will be doing some praying of their own, Hall said.

"They have linebackers as fast as ours," Hall said. "The K-State defense reminds me a lot of our Wrecking Crew, because they're very fast and they swarm to the ball. It'll be a tough game for us on offense."

In the speed department, Hall ranks high. He posted the team's third-highest 40-yard dash time with a 4.41, and has an easier time breaking tackles due to his leg strength.

"I hate to be compared to anyone, but if I had to, I'd say I was like a Warrick Dunn or a Barry Sanders," Hall said. "I can get 2 or 3 yards, and every now and then I can break one open eventually."

And when that happens, Snyder said, look out.

"You just don't want to get in a foot race with him," Snyder said. "You're not always sure you can win."

ABSOLUTE PHENOMENON

YANA DORODNOVA EXCELS ON COURT AS WELL AS IN CLASSROOM

As the world watched the Soviet Union crumble in the summer of 1991, Yana Dorodnova had more important things to worry about.

Dorodnova was worried about making the trip to her hometown, Moscow, for her sister's wedding after playing in the Junior National Tennis Tournament in Kiev, Ukraine.

"Everything collapsed while I was in Kiev," she said. "They shut down all the transportation back to Moscow, and I didn't think I'd make it to my sister's wedding."

STORY BY JOEL WHITE

A day after the collapse, the transportation system was running again and she arrived at her sister's wedding on time. She said because of the wedding, she put tennis on the back burner.

"I don't remember how I did in the tournament," she said. "I was thinking more about going home."

The only things that are crumbling around Dorodnova now are her opponents on the tennis court.

In last weekend's Arizona State Invitational, Dorodnova advanced to the third-place match by knocking off two nationally-ranked opponents.

Dorodnova upset 77th-ranked Mirja Wallmark of San Diego and 42nd-ranked Stephanie Lansdorp of Arizona State in the tournament.

Success at the collegiate level is nothing new to Dorodnova. She was an all-Big 12 selection in singles and doubles in spring '97.

In spring '96, she led the Wildcats to the national tournament, which was the team's first trip to the tournament in its history.

Dorodnova's achievements in the classroom perhaps eclipse her success on the court.

At just 20 years old, and already a senior, she maintains a 3.9 grade point average in social science. She received academic all-Big 12 honors and was an ITA Scholar Athlete All-American last year.

Prior to coming to K-State, Dorodnova attended Russia's State Academy of Physical Training. Had she continued to live in Russia after graduating from the Academy, she would have been forced to give up playing tennis.

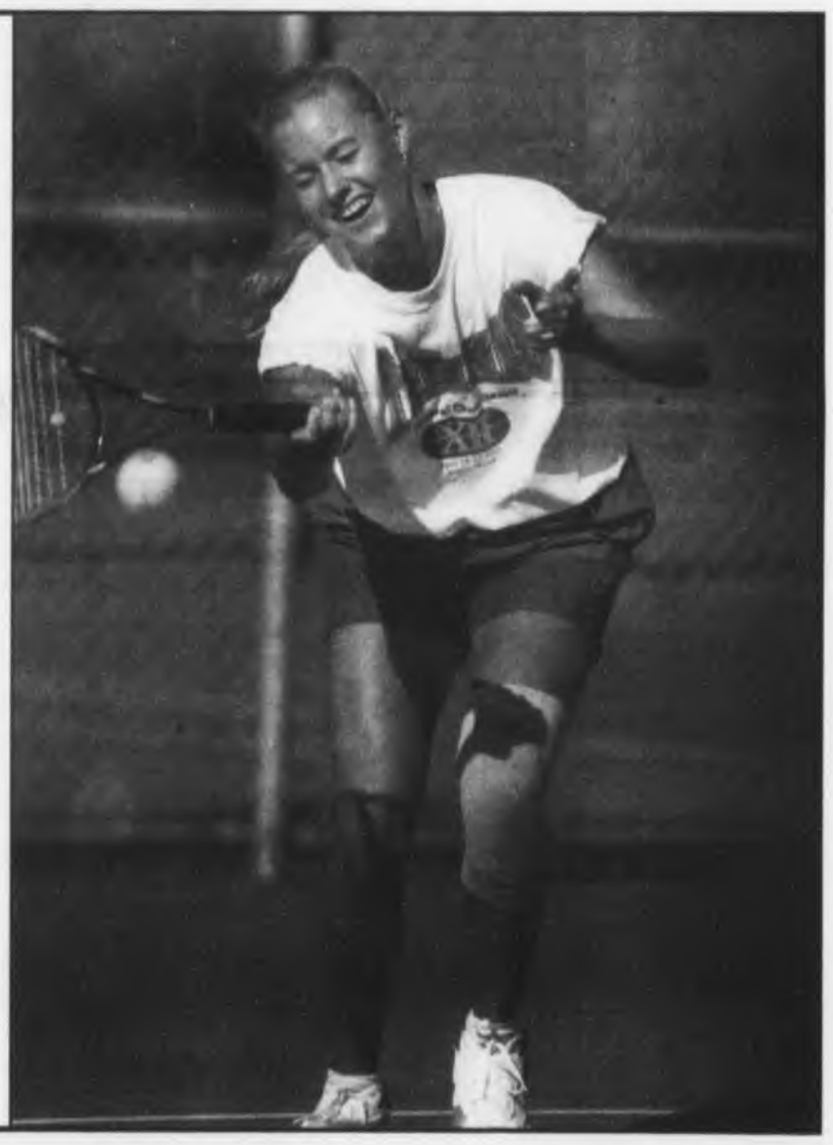
"In Russia, there is no college tennis," she said. "It is too difficult to go to college and play tennis at the same time."

"I wanted to still play tennis and go to college," she said. "That's why I came to the United States."

Dorodnova would have never made it to K-State if it weren't for her parents, who introduced her to tennis at a young age.

"My parents saw an advertisement in the newspaper for tennis tryouts," she said. "I went to the tryouts, and they accepted me into the club."

Under the Soviet system, playing with the tennis club was free, but they accepted nothing less than perfection.



"If you want to stay with a team, you have to be good," Dorodnova said. "If you fail, you're going to be off the team."

Dorodnova had no problem staying with the club as she ascended to the top of the national tennis scene. When she was 14 years old, she placed second in the 14-and-under Junior National Tournament for the Soviet Union. At 18, again she placed second in the National Tournament, yet this time it was for Russia.

As a child in the former Soviet Union, Dorodnova knew very little of her nation's distress. She said the bombardment of communist propaganda led her to believe that everything was fine.

Dorodnova said now that she knows more about the former Soviet Union, she is happy to be living in its aftermath.

"I am happy that I lived in the former Soviet Union, because it makes me realize how many more opportunities that I have now at Kansas State," she said.

Texas Aggies see Bishop as threat; Cats sweating trio of running backs

JESS C. LOUK
staff writer

The Wildcats traveled down to College Station, Texas, and defeated the Texas A&M Aggies 23-20 last fall. No one wearing maroon that day has forgotten the K-State team they saw a year ago.

"They're well-coached, and they play hard," A&M coach R.C. Slocum said. "They're a real solid football team."

But this year is much different than last year for both A&M and the Cats. The Aggies had already lost three games before they faced K-State a year ago, and were 3-3 before the Cats dropped them below the .500 mark.

This year, the Aggies are undefeated and ranked No. 14 in the country. The Cats are 4-1 overall and 1-1 in Big 12 play.

Last week, the Aggies managed to drop a spot in the polls, even though they pounded Iowa State 56-17.

But, as Slocum will admit, Iowa State does not pose the threats that K-State does. Mainly, K-State has Michael Bishop.

"He's not some little skinny guy with good quickness." Slocum said. "He's a big, physical running back playing quarterback. He can break tackles, and he can make you miss him. He can do it all.

"We will not play against a single player this year in any of our games that will cause us any more concern," Slocum said. "Whether it's a receiver, running back or whatever, we won't face anyone who causes us more concern than this guy."

If A&M sticks to its basic 3-4 defense, the team will be using it to try to stop Bishop and the K-State offense.

The 3-4 has proven to be successful against the Aggies' opponents this year. The Aggies' defense is ranked No. 1 in the Big 12 in both scoring defense and total defense.

Only Iowa State has scored more than 10 points against the Aggies' defense this year. But K-State coach Bill Snyder is not just worried about the A&M defense.

"We see Texas A&M as a challenge in all facets of the game," Snyder said. "Offense, defense, kicking — they're just a good football team."

For this year's game, A&M looks much the same as it did last year. The Aggies only lost four starters on the offensive side of the ball and five on the defensive. A&M is returning 43 lettermen this year.

But most significantly, the Aggies return a trio of dangerous running backs: Sirr Parker, D'Andre "Tiki" Hardeman and Dante Hall. The three have split time running the ball this season. All three of the Aggie running backs rushed for more than 600 yards last year. And all rushed for more than 100 yards in two different games last season.

"They have some big, strong guys," Cat defensive end Joe Bob Clements said. "They're really going to pound it at us. The only way to counter that is to get physical."

While the lines are getting physical, the Aggies will rotate their quarterback position. Branndon Stewart and Randy McCown have shared time taking snaps this season.

Slocum said the time sharing at quarterback has gone relatively smoothly even though it could have been a problem.

"I do think it's a credit to those two guys," Slocum said. "If one of those guys had a different personality, then it could have been a problem."

Fans of Tigermania hinder professional golf

The year of the Tiger is nearing an end.

I'm, of course, referring to Tiger Woods' first full year as a professional golfer.

Woods turned the PGA Tour and sports in general upside-down by becoming the youngest player ever to win the Masters Tournament. He is about to become the first golfer ever to earn more than $2 million in a single year.

In the process, the phenom's fame vaulted so high that perhaps only Michael Jordan is more recognizable around the globe.

For the most part, the changes Tigermania has brought about are for the better. He's attracted more minority fans and players to a traditionally all-white sport. He's also lured more kids to the game to help dispel the myth that golf is a sport for old, retired men.

In addition, tournaments that Woods has competed in have steadily set attendance records and television ratings have gone through the roof.

With all of the positive effects that Woods' rise to the pinnacle of golf has caused, there have also been a few negatives.

One of these negatives involves Woods' enormous gallery of fans that accompany him at every tournament.

You see, golf is a game requiring tremendous concentration, so the slightest distraction can cause an errant shot. Some of Woods' fans are either unaware of this fact or just don't care because there have been numerous instances throughout the year that have angered Woods' opponents.

Jeff Maggert, who played in the same group as Woods at the Buick Classic in Rye, NY, labeled some of Woods' fans obnoxious when they unremittingly yelled, "You're the man, Tiger!" I had the opportunity to attend the Buick Classic in June and the fans weren't just obnoxious, they were downright rude.

To give an example, one teen-ager sitting next to me on the bleachers kept yelling, "Tiger!" over and over. I could tell that everyone sitting around this little brat, including myself, wanted to knock him into the next fairway, but we all managed to restrain ourselves.

When Woods finished the hole, the kid started talking loudly to his friend and tried to leave for the next hole as Mark Brooks attempted a putt. When a marshal told the kid to be quiet, he declared with a snide eastern accent, "So what, he's not going to win anyway."

He wasn't the only one that felt that way, either. Before the rest of the players finished, a big portion of the gallery rushed noisily to the next hole to position themselves to catch a glimpse of Woods.

Also, instead of using the walkways, fans continually ducked under the ropes lining the course in order to get across the fairway to a better position. The dismayed marshals tried to hold them back, but the sheer number of people trying to cross to the other side made their attempts futile.

VIEWPOINT

CRESTON KUENZI

CRESTON KUENZI is a junior in computer engineering. You can send your e-mail to Creston at creston@ksu.edu

Another interesting aspect that surprised me about Woods' fans was the number of groupies that follow him around. I hadn't seen so many hysterically lustful women in leather pants crowd around someone since a big group of women gathered feverishly around me one time in Aggieville.

Oh, wait a minute. Scratch that last part. I guess that was a dream I had the other night.

Anyway, maybe all of what I experienced at the Buick Classic can be attributed to the area of the country in which this tournament took place. The people of New York aren't exactly known for their high ideals and courtesy.

However, similar things have been occurring all over the country. Several of Woods' opponents have complained about the overall lack of respect the fans have displayed to them.

In Lemont, Ill., at the Motorola Western Open, fans actually broke through the ropes and followed Woods up the fairway to the 18th green.

Until the PGA officials make a concerted effort to enforce the rules more strictly, the fans caught up in Tigermania will continue to be a hindrance for many years to come.

CIA reveals intelligence budget, refuses to disclose further details

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — The CIA ended 50 years of secrecy Wednesday surrounding how much the government spends to spy, announcing in response to a lawsuit that the annual budget for national intelligence is $26.6 billion.

Disclosure came in a one-sentence legal filing by Lee Strickland, a CIA information officer: "In response to the referenced Freedom of Information Act request, the total budget appropriation for intelligence for fiscal year 1997 is $26.6 billion."

The budget, covering the fiscal year that ended Sept. 30, includes the CIA, the National Reconnaissance Office, the Defense Intelligence Agency and other branches of the vast U.S. intelligence-gathering apparatus, as well as tactical military intelligence.

No breakdown of how the money was spent was provided and CIA Director George Tenet said none would be.

"The administration intends to draw a firm line at the top line," Tenet said. "Beyond this figure, there will be no other disclosures of currently classified budget information because such disclosures could harm national security."

Tenet also said the administration would decide on a year-by-year basis whether to reveal overall intelligence spending. Neither Congress nor the administration has provided the intelligence budget for fiscal 1998, but a congressional staffer, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said it was only slightly larger.

To put the intelligence budget in perspective, the total was somewhat lower than what the federal government spent last year on transportation, $35.9 billion, and health and human services, $34 billion, not including Social Security.

Despite the lack of details, the Federation of American Scientists, which filed the suit, has been able to construct approximate breakdowns of intelligence spending based on an inadvertent disclosure by the House Appropriations Committee three years ago.

About $10 billion of the total goes for tactical military intelligence, serving battlefield commanders; the CIA itself gets about $3 billion; the National Security Agency, which conducts electronic eavesdropping and decoding operations, gets about $4 billion; the National Reconnaissance Office, which builds and operates spy satellites, gets about $6 billion.

The rest is divided among a variety of intelligence analysis agencies such as the National Imagery and Mapping Agency, and intelligence offices at the FBI, State Department, Energy Department and elsewhere.

Plugging the $26.6 billion figure into an unclassified percentage comparison of intelligence spending published last year by a government review panel indicates spending on intelligence peaked in 1989 at about $34.5 billion, up dramatically from about $15.2 billion in 1980. In other words, today's intelligence budget is about average for the last decade of the Cold War.

Not since World War II, when the War Department budget listed appropriations for the Office of Strategic Services, precursor to the CIA, has the intelligence budget been made public. The CIA, which is celebrating its 50th anniversary this year, has long argued that revealing the spending total would give adversaries a window into the capabilities and limits of U.S. spycraft.

That barrier to disclosure collapsed in April 1996 when President Clinton announced he would support disclosing the total. When the CIA continued to refuse to make the figure public, and when Congress this year voted against disclosure, the Federation of American Scientists sued.

"It appears that the only force for change is lawsuits from the public," said federation chief Steve Aftergood, in whose name the federal lawsuit, Aftergood v. CIA, was filed. "These institutions are not going to reform themselves."

Attorney Kate Martin of the Center for National Security Studies, which handled the lawsuit for the federation, said Clinton's support for releasing the intelligence budget made it impossible for the CIA to use national security as a reason for refusing to disclose the figure.

"CIA secrecy didn't serve the national security, it just kept Americans in the dark about how their tax dollars are being spent," Martin said.

Yale scientists use salmonella to fight cancer

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW HAVEN, Conn. — Scientists believe they have discovered a novel use for deadly salmonella bacteria — as a possible treatment for cancer.

Yale University School of Medicine scientists reported in Wednesday's issue of the journal Cancer Research that genetically engineered strains of salmonella were found to target and slow the growth of tumors in laboratory mice.

The method was applied successfully with human melanoma, breast, colon, prostate, lung and renal tumors that were injected into live mice.

Salmonella carrying anti-tumor genes were shown to somewhat prolong the life of the mice but did not necessarily eradicate the tumors, the scientists said.

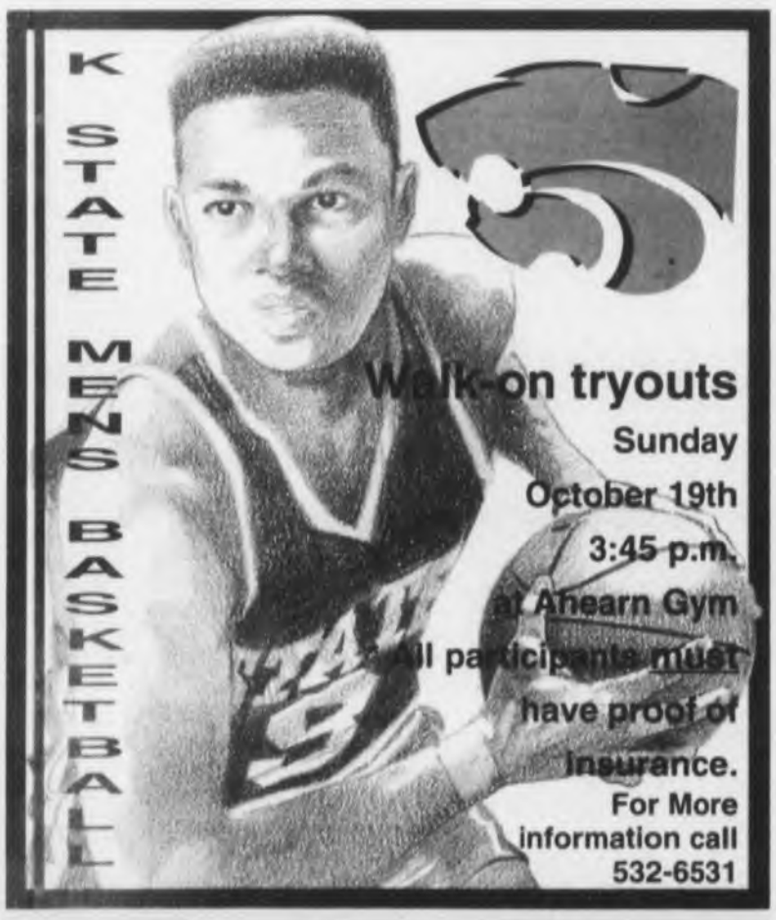
"After the salmonella are introduced into the mouse bloodstream, they seek out tumors, multiply there in great numbers, and — by mechanisms not fully understood — dramatically slow the rate of tumor growth and prolong life," said John M. Pawelek, a Yale cancer biologist.

In no case did the researchers cure cancer, although some tumors were destroyed.

Salmonella bacteria, in their unaltered form, can cause food poisoning and septic shock. The mutated salmonella do not kill the animal because the bacteria can only survive inside the tumor, where they are fed with necessary sugars and amino acids, Pawelek said.

"We have genetically engineered the salmonella so that they do not set off the immune system alarm. These things are now like stealth bombers," he said.

"We've made salmonella both safe and effective for laboratory animals, and now the challenge is to do the same for humans."



Donella Wilson, scientific program director in the research department of the American Cancer Society in Atlanta, said the findings are promising because until now, scientists have been unable to find a way to target tumors alone.

"They have a few more questions to answer experimentally ... but the idea is very good," Wilson said.

Savio Woo, director of the Institute for Gene Therapy and Molecular Medicine at Mount Sinai Medical Center in New York, said the new strategy is attractive and deserves further study, but he had some reservations.

"The potential limitation is the interaction with the host immune system. When the host immune system mounts an antibody response, that could limit the effectiveness for long-term treatment," he said.

The Yale researchers expect to approach the Food and Drug Administration for approval of human trials within a year.

CURRY'S STATEHOUSE MURALS A KANSAS LEGACY

Although scholars continue to debate John Steuart Curry's place in American art history, it remains certain Curry's murals for the Kansas Statehouse will remain a state artistic treasure.

Curry's Statehouse murals, which encompass the state's early association with the Coronado expedition through John Brown and the Civil War to a peaceful family farm, have been the subject of controversy and analysis since they were painted in the 1940s.

Charles Eldredge, Hall Professor of American Art at the University of Kansas, said the murals have been important public visibility for Curry. He said although they are grand, they aren't the sole legacy of Curry's career.

"They are rightfully a great accomplishment in American art," Eldredge said.

Patricia Junker, associate curator of American Art at the Fine Arts Museums of San Francisco, said the Statehouse murals as the defining moment of Curry's career, as do many critics and scholars.

"It was a source of great pride. There was nothing ... that came close to the excitement and dedication as those Kansas murals. When they were dismissed by the public it devastated him," Junker said.

The murals have been a requisite stop for decades for elementary school children on their visit to the Statehouse.

Another Kansas stop is his family's farmstead near Dunavant in northeast Kansas. The house has since been moved to Oskaloosa, Kan., and is open for public tours.

On display at the Curry home are memorabilia, paintings and prints.

CURRY EXHIBIT at a glance

The Kansas Capitol building, in downtown Topeka, is open from 8 a.m. to 5:30 p.m. daily. The Curry murals are directly off the second floor rotunda in both wings. Admission is free. For more information call (785) 296-3966.

John Steuart Curry's birthplace and home in Oskaloosa is open to the public between May and late September. The crafts shop located on the compound is open from 1 to 5 p.m. on Saturday and Sunday through Christmas and tours can be arranged from there. For off-season tours of six or more, call (785) 863-2520 and ask for Vicki Metzler.

"John Steuart Curry: Selections from the Permanent Collection" will be at the art museum until Jan. 11, 1998. Topeka art enthusiast Don Lambert will portray Curry in a special presentation from 7 to 8 p.m. on Oct. 30 at the museum.

Museum hours are 10 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. Tuesday through Friday and 1 to 4:30 p.m. Saturday and Sunday. The museum is open until 8 p.m. on Thursday. Admission is free. Call 532-7718 for more information.

rethinking history

ART SCHOLARS ARE RECASTING THE WORK OF JOHN STEUART CURRY IN A DIFFERENT LIGHT

Kansas artist John Steuart Curry never found favor with Kansas audiences, but a rising tide of interest in the Regionalist movement in which he was involved could bring new light to his career.

Curry is the subject of an exhibition at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art until Jan. 11, which celebrates the 100th anniversary of his birth on Nov. 14, 1897. The art museum has a small collection of his work, most notably "Sunrise" and "Sun Dogs;" the latter was in 1935 the first painting to enter the collection of a Kansas public institution.

Curry was born and raised in Kansas during his childhood, but never forgot his experiences once he moved to Westport, Conn., as an adult. He returned to Kansas countless times in his paintings. He died in 1946.

The rise of the Regionalists in the 1930s gave Curry, Thomas Hart Benton of Missouri and Grant Wood of Iowa a national audience. The sudden fall of the Regionalists from the preoccupation of critics and art leaders in the 1940s had as much to do with politics as it did the advent of the Abstract Expressionists and World War II.

Patricia Junker, associate curator of American art at the Fine Arts Museums of San Francisco, has organized a retrospective of Curry's work, "John Steuart Curry: Inventing the Middle West."

The show debuts at the Elvehjem Museum of Art at the University of Wisconsin-Madison this spring before moving to San Francisco and finally, on Oct. 11, 1998, to the Nelson-Atkins Museum of Art in Kansas City, Mo. Curry was artist-in-residence at UW-Madision in 1936.

Junker owes the renewed interest in the Regionalists and Curry to a complex turn of events in the art world.

"For so long, realist and regionalist painting was out of favor," Junker said. "It's only now we've looked back and realized the value of regionalist movements in this country."

> "Sooner or later this revisionist impulse, which in the course of time has often degenerated into a smug and uncritical belief in the excellence of just about anything produced in the name of art in the United States, was bound to turn its attention to the Regionalist school."
> • Hilton Kramer
> art critic

Junker said she has noticed a resurgence of realism in contemporary painting, which she said reflects abstraction being a poor means for interpreting social aspects.

"I think there is a continuing cycle — a move from abstraction to realism as there is from cerebral to content," Junker said. "There are continuing regional movements of artists addressing the needs of their place and their time. I don't think regionalism ended."

Regionalism was aligned with the political movement Populism, which stressed a return to all things American and a rejection of foreign influence, as opposed to the geographical term of regionalism. In short, Regionalism was isolationist.

Curry, with Benton and Wood, were the artists of Regionalism who were to proudly herald a new, purely American artistic style.

"It was no longer pertinent with the beginning of World War II. Americans became much more international in their outlook," Junker said. "The international conflict of the war, the mobilization of young men from the farm to the cities really changed Americans' views of their own values."

Aiding Junker's scholarship were recently released papers from Curry's estate, which have helped to shed more light on the artist's life.

Junker said for her, Curry is an inconsistent artist, but more adventuresome than other regionalists.

"He's motivated by an attachment to place — giving the agricultural landscape an emotional intensity. He tries to boil it down to its essentials: life and death," Junker said.

Junker said Curry is important for painting the social issues of the 1930s and 1940s in a way that viewers can apprehend them, making them timeless.

"To make a social stand without being propagandistic is amazing to me," Junker said.

To some, Curry is an artist who continues the American tradition of representation and landscape painting.

Charles Eldredge, Hall Professor of American Art at the University of Kansas, said Curry's generation is ripe for reappraisal.

"Curry's work may be the least well-known, or known on the basis of but a few pieces," Eldredge said. "It's an opportunity to explore issues of regional loyalty. The

Avis accused of discriminating against minority car renters

ASSOCIATED PRESS

HARRISBURG, Pa. — Avis, already facing racial discrimination lawsuits in North Carolina and Florida, has been accused of allowing two Pennsylvania franchises to use illegal tactics to prevent minorities from renting cars.

The state filed a discrimination complaint Tuesday against Avis and its Harrisburg franchise, Barbush Rentals, citing a "clear pattern of abuse," Attorney General Michael Fisher said. Avis, based in Garden City, N.Y., is accused of knowing about the discriminatory practices and not stopping them.

At a glance
Avis rentals is facing a racial discrimination lawsuit after two Pennsylvania franchises were accused of using illegal tactics to prevent minorities from renting cars.

The nation's No. 2 car rental company faces similar accusations in North Carolina and Florida. Avis officials denied "the allegations of intentional discrimination."

During a three-year investigation, Pennsylvania found African American customers were treated differently than Caucasians at the Avis Rent-A-Car Systems Inc. branches in Harrisburg and Harrisburg International Airport from January 1994 to April of this year, Fisher said.

Among the allegations:

- Caucasian customers were given cars after African American undercover agents were told no vehicles were available.
- African American customers were not allowed to pay with a debit card, while Caucasian renters could.
- African American customers were told they had to rent a car for a minimum of three days, while Caucasian customers could rent for one day.
- Hispanic and African American customers were more vigorously questioned than Caucasians.

The complaint also cited a "local renter's policy," which applied more stringent credit rules to customers living within 25 miles of Avis branches. The complaint said the rules were only enforced at Avis outlets in predominantly African American neighborhoods.

The Barbush agency told investigators it created the policy because "local renters are causing an inordinately high percentage of repair costs" and that the company was "finding a lot of drugs and drug paraphernalia left in the cars."

The complaint seeks punitive damages against Avis and the franchise, and calls for the mandatory employee training to avoid future discriminatory practices.

The state's Human Rights Commission will review the complaint and either dismiss it or hold an administrative hearing.

Avis stock dropped 12.5 cents to $28.50 in New York Stock Exchange composite trading Tuesday.

Local car rental agency unaware of national suit

JOHN HENDERSON
senior staff writer

The office and district managers of the local Avis rental car service said they were unaware of the recent discrimination suit filed against the company.

The Avis center at Manhattan Municipal Airport is a licensee of Avis Rent-A-Car, the second largest car rental company in America.

That means they're a locally owned operation, but pay for the use of some services, including the Avis name.

The Manhattan office requires three things of every customer, regardless of personal status. They must have a valid driver's license, a prominent credit card and they must be at least 21 years of age.

The district manager declined to comment on a lawsuit based on the practices of an Avis office in Harrisburg, Penn.

Plutonium-powered spacecraft begins journey to Saturn

ASSOCIATED PRESS

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — NASA's plutonium-powered Cassini spacecraft safely rocketed away Wednesday, beginning a 7-year, 2-billion-mile journey to the ringed planet Saturn following weeks of bitter protests.

"It's beautiful. It's beautiful," murmured Charles Kohlhase, Cassini's science and mission design manager. "We've been waiting a long time for this."

The mammoth Titan 4-B rocket carrying Cassini blasted through clouds into a moonlit sky well before dawn. Saturn appeared as a yellowish speck above the nearly full moon; Venus and Jupiter also were visible.

Scientists and engineers cheered and embraced when Cassini shot out of Earth orbit 40 minutes after liftoff and streaked at nearly 25,000 mph toward Venus and, ultimately, Saturn. Everything went perfectly on this second launch attempt; high wind and computer problems scuttled Monday's effort.

"This is a historic moment because it is the link that connects this millennium to the next millennium," said Giancarlo Setti, chairman of the Italian Space Agency's scientific committee.

With 72 pounds of plutonium aboard Cassini — the most ever flown in space ,— anti-nuclear activists feared a of radioactive shower in the event of a rocket explosion. NASA insisted all along, however, that the launch would be safe because of the numerous precautions taken with the poisonous substance, shielded several times over.

"We're all very excited. We knew there wouldn't be a problem," said the Department of Energy's Beverly Cook, wh is in charge of Cassini's nuclear load. "But we were prepared — it's designed for accidents. I'd hate to have lost this mission, but there wasn't going to be a safety problem."

The plutonium is needed to power Cassini, the largest, most expensive interplanetary probe ever assembled by NASA. Saturn is so far from the sun that traditional solar panels would be useless unless they were the size of a couple of tennis courts, and then they would be too big to launch.

Cassini's $3.4 billion mission won't begin, scientifically, until the spacecraft reaches Saturn in 2004. The route to get there is circuitous to say the least: The first stop, so to speak, is Venus in 1998 and again in 1999 for gravity-assisted speed.

The spacecraft also will sweep within 500 miles of Earth in 1999 — which has Cassini opponents more terrified than did the launch — and by Jupiter in 2000. Cook said there is a less than one-in-1 million chance that the probe would re-enter Earth's atmosphere in 1999 and spread plutonium.

"If there is a problem, I still believe it's very safe," Cook said Wednesday morning.

If all goes well, the two-story robotic explorer will be the first probe to orbit Saturn, doing so 74 times from 2004 through 2008. Previously, three spacecraft — Pioneer 11 and Voyagers 1 and 2 — flew past Saturn in the late 1970s and early 1980s.

Cassini also will sweep 45 times past Titan, Saturn's largest moon and the second-largest moon in the solar system. Perhaps most spectacularly, Cassini will release a European-built probe to land on the frigid Titan. Scientists say its cold, preserved state could provide clues as to how life evolved on Earth.

"The scale of this project kind of matches the majesty of the place where it's going," said Wesley Huntress Jr., NASA's space science chief. "This is the second-largest planet in the solar system, and you put the rings around it and it's the biggest. It's also the most spectacular. It has a huge retinue of moons and this strange and enigmatic place called Titan that we don't know very much about."

Cassini, named after the 17th-century Italian astronomer who discovered the largest gap in Saturn's rings, is the last of NASA's big-ticket interplanetary spacecraft. Development began in 1989, well before the space agency was forced to shrink its work force and budget.

Future probes will be a mere 10 to 15 percent the size and cost of Cassini, Huntress said. As a result, they will need far less plutonium for power, he said.

Anti-nuclear activists promised to continue their fight.

"It's a bigger picture than even just Cassini. This is an icebreaker," said Carol Mosley of the Florida Coalition for Peace and Justice, which failed in its court attempt to stop Cassini. "We just keep going."

Weekend rainfall ruins family's plans for Halloween sorghum maze

JENNI EVANS
staff reporter

If you build it, they will come.

About 400 to 450 people visited the Corbin family farm during the last two months to take their chances at making it through a maze cut into their sorghum field.

Nicole Corbin, junior in agricultural business, helped her younger sisters Stacie, 16, and Carol, 13, with the creation of the maze.

"It was a lot of hard work, but it was really an unusual attraction," Nicole said.

Her father, Jim Corbin, planted the five-acre plot in early July using sargo, a form of forage sorghum.

"It's very similar to milo but it gets a lot taller. Milo only grows to about 6 feet tall and and the sorghum grew to between eight and 10," Nicole said.

During the first week in August, the three sisters helped their father mow the field, which stood about 2 feet high. They each counted off rows of sorghum and helped their father maneuver his riding lawn mower as he read Stacie's map.

"It took us 15 hours to get it all mowed out," Nicole explained.

On Labor Day weekend, the Corbins opened their maze to the pubic. The crop stood at its full height and was challenging to most people who went through it.

The maze took an average of 45 minutes to complete.

"We'd even get confused when we went through it. You have to have a good sense of direction to get through it. It took me about 30 minutes," she said.

The Corbins had intended to keep their maze open through the end of October, or as long as the weather permitted.

The family had planned to add Halloween elements to their maze.

"We wanted to have spooks jump out and do fun things around Halloween, but the rain over the weekend destroyed it," Nicole said.

The rain and wind on Sunday managed to break off most of the heavy stalks of sorghum. The first two alleys of the maze were broken during rainfall in late September, but the family was able to repair some of the damage.

"When we went out to look at it on Sunday, it was gone. There really wasn't any way we could fix it," Nicole said.

This was the second year that the Corbin family had created the maze.

The idea for building the maze came several years ago when the three sisters

Ruling won't affect assisted-suicide battle

ASSOCIATED PRESS

SALEM, Ore. — The U.S. Supreme Court's decision not to hear a challenge to an Oregon law allowing terminally ill patients to get a doctor's help in killing themselves is likely to have little effect in the battle over assisted suicide.

Although the court's decision cleared the way for the law to take effect within a week or so, voters will have the opportunity to repeal the measure before people have any chance under the law to kill themselves. Ballots to repeal the law were to be mailed out beginning today and tallied on Nov. 4.

The 1994 measure allows doctors to prescribe lethal drugs to terminally ill patients deemed to have less than six months to live. It had been stalled by legal challenges.

Tuesday's action by the nation's highest court left intact a federal appeals court ruling that said two doctors and a terminally ill woman who challenged the law lacked the proper legal standing to sue.

Lawyers on both sides of the assisted-suicide struggle said they doubt there will be enough time for anyone to use the law to commit suicide. There is a 15-day waiting period for a patient to obtain a lethal prescription and opponents could easily obtain a court injunction blocking the law before the period expires.

But backers of assisted suicide said the court's action knocks down opponents' hypothetical arguments against the law.

"The Supreme Court doesn't think people have suffered any injury because of assisted suicide," said Barbara Coombs Lee, one of the state's leading backers of assisted suicide.

The justices ruled in June that terminally ill Americans have no constitutional right to doctor-assisted suicide. But those decisions, upholding bans on assisted suicide in New York and Washington state, did not ban states from letting doctors prescribe deadly drugs for mentally competent but terminally ill patients who want to die, as the Oregon law does.

Opponents said the high court ruling has little significance and that they will continue to try to persuade voters the law is too flawed to implement.

"It is important that they not take this decision as an endorsement of the law," said Trish Conrad, manager of the campaign seeking to repeal assisted suicide.

The 1997 state Legislature placed the repeal measure on the ballot after intense lobbying by the Oregon Catholic Conference and other groups that oppose assisted suicide.

Opponents said they plan to return to court soon with a new lawsuit seeking to keep the law from being implemented.

Peter Cogswell, a spokesman for the state attorney general's office, said opponents could easily stall the law again.

"We've been at this since 1994," he said. "If they refile their lawsuit, then we start the entire process all over again."

Professional ag engineers are rare in this country, George said, mainly because the federal government provides many such services for free.

"We're dominated by extension services and soil conservationists," he said. "Except that (those offices) have never had a mandate to always provide services as wide-ranging as they need to be."

The association has contracts all over the world, from Japan to Romania to Costa Rica. They design and help construct livestock pens, from beef and pork feed lots to dairy facilities.

"We've done a few university research facilities," he said. "We have contracts in Minnesota, Wisconsin and Arkansas."

George said he needs the plane for all the traveling he does. He's flown to Nebraska and Oklahoma and all over Kansas, though not to other countries.

Murphy said George's designs make it easier for ranchers to keep livestock and not worry about hurting the environment.

George grew up in Uniontown, one of nine children on a livestock farm. He learned to appreciate his current job very early on, shoveling manure on his parents' farm.

"I grew up with the squish between my toes," he said jokingly.

George will return to Manhattan Airport Friday to visit Jeff, a senior in animal sciences, and Jonna, freshman in criminology.

While physical fitness is important to her, Irwin said she never took the class in hopes the requirement would be dropped. Physical fitness classes in high school prepared her for a lifetime of physical activity, she added.

"I'm in college to learn how to be a graphic designer," Irwin said. "Kinesiology 101 won't help me do that."

HERPES

Condoms appear to be less effective in blocking herpes than other diseases, because the virus can be transmitted from parts of the body not covered by a condom.

Gray Davis, president of the Herpes Advice Center in Durham, N.C., said the study shows many people ignored safe-sex warnings about AIDS in the 1980s.

"What these numbers are telling us is that the young, sexually active white population didn't consider themselves at risk for HIV," she said. "So the HIV message, while it was very effective in the gay population, where it was targeted to, didn't reach the rest of the population."

One reason for concern is that herpes sores make a person more vulnerable to infection with the AIDS virus, the researchers said in the study, published Thursday in the New England Journal of Medicine.

Experts said it is time to get tougher on herpes. They said new steps could include screening for it in patients at clinics for sexually transmitted diseases and in pregnant women, whose newborns could die if infected.

"We're screening for HIV, we're screening for hepatitis B, we aren't screening for genital herpes," said Dr. Lawrence Corey of the University of Washington.

Genital herpes is caused by the herpes simplex type 2 virus, and much less often by the type 1 virus. The study used blood samples from about 24,000 people to reveal the prevalence of type 2 infection.

The data were gathered between 1988 and 1994 and compared with a similar study done from 1976 to 1980.

The results suggest that 45 million Americans are infected, including 18 percent of whites and 46 percent of blacks.

Among whites ages 12 to 19, the infection rate jumped from slightly less than 1 percent to 4.5 percent.

The rate among whites in their 20s went from 7.7 percent to 14.7 percent. Among older whites and all blacks, the increases in each age group were too small to be considered significant.

Genital herpes causes occasional outbreaks of sores or itching in the genital areas and around the buttocks or thighs. The sores can look like ulcers or paper cuts, and they can be painful. No cure is known.

People can transmit the virus to a sex partner even when they don't have symptoms. Only 9 percent of infected people in the study even knew they had the virus.

"We're taking time to get the message out to undergraduates and graduate alumni, and take time to build an educational support program," Dittrick said.

Dittrick said he wants people to know substance-free environments are coming, and to be aware of it.

Phi Gamma Delta is considering a number of incentives to encourage chapters to become substance-free immediately.

"We plan to have a major education program. The Betty Ford Center in Palm Springs, Calif., has agreed to work with us in developing an education program," Dittrick said. "The programs will be disseminated through all the chapters."

Dittrick said he thinks the Interfraternity Council will probably open discussion towards becoming substance-free at many campuses.

He also said he thinks that Phi Gamma Delta's rush will not be affected.

"Alcohol isn't a reason to rush," Dittrick said.

"The fraternity is a group, which will be substance-free, focusing on education, leadership and other things — not drinking clubs," he added.

"Alcohol is not binding for fraternities. It's a poor factor to bind," Dittrick said. "Becoming substance-free will create a stronger fraternity."

for a similar incident earlier this year, which was merely a repeat of what he said happens at the Delta Chi house every year.

"I cannot remember a semester on campus when they were not involved in some violation of university policy," he said.

The fraternity will be given a chance to clear its name at a hearing yet to be scheduled, but Glenn sounded skeptical of its chances.

"I don't know if they're quite as bad as 'Animal House.' But I think I saw John Belushi there once," he said of the 1970s movie starring Belushi as rabble-rouser of a destructive fraternity house.

whole issue of how a sense of place would help to shape a person's world view."

Eldredge contributed an essay to the catalog that will accompany the upcoming Curry retrospective. Curry was most recently revisited in literary form by M. Sue Kendall's 1986 book, "Rethinking Regionalism: John Steuart Curry and the Kansas Mural Controversy." The retrospective's book will be the most comprehensive accumulation of Curry's art.

Eldredge said in the pluralistic culture of the 1990s, the study of Curry's work allows us to see how artists have valued regions and what is the meaning of region. Eldredge said that although no one could accuse Curry of being a modernist, the way he tackled issues may be a revelation.

"At once, he looked both back to pictorial traditions and yet forward to changing circumstances in the landscape, in the agrarian landscape he frequently devoted himself to," he said.

Eldredge said he thinks the lack of scholarship on Curry illustrates how the abstract painters of the 1940s and 1950s eclipsed the great painters who emerged between the wars: Georgia O'Keeffe, Arthur Dove, Curry and the Regionalists.

While Curry will enjoy more exposure in the country in 1998, there are still critics who dismiss the Regionalist movement and Curry's fellow artists Benton and Wood.

During Benton's retrospective at the Nelson-Atkins in 1989, Time magazine critic Robert Hughes wrote Benton was a "dreadful artist" and not a maker of "major art."

In Hughes recent look at American art, "American Visions," he again lambastes Benton and dismisses Curry in a paragraph.

Time magazine is largely credited by historians as having an important role in creating the Regionalist movement with their December 1934 cover story featuring a portrait of Benton.

Grant Wood's retrospective in 1983 drew protests from critics, especially New York Times critic Hilton Kramer.

In his critique of the exhibition, Kramer regarded Wood's art as "feeble stuff" and "ludicrous."

Both Kramer and Hughes pointed to the falsity of the Regionalist movement — how three artists who were all rooted in European traditions and the East Coast art world could pass themselves off as Midwestern farm boys.

Kramer suggested the recent revival of Regionalism had more to do with revisionist history and money than with deserved recognition. He argued Regionalism prospered at the expense of visionary American Modernists.

Kramer wrote "sooner or later this revisionist impulse, which in the course of time has often degenerated into a smug and uncritical belief in the excellence of just about anything produced in the name of art in the United States, was bound to turn its attention to the Regionalist school."

Although these two critics were responding to Benton and Wood, they both criticized the Regionalists of which Curry was a large player. Perhaps it is owed to Curry never having a large retrospective of work since 1946 that little scholarship or criticism has been written.

MAZE

The idea for building the maze came several years ago when the three sisters read about a maze cut into a crop in Pennsylvania.

Stacie created the maze on graphing paper and then had her sisters help their father in actually mowing out the maze and running it on weekends.

"I though it was a really neat idea. Stacie is real smart like that," Nicole said.

Last year's maze was a circular maze that contained a chicken alley for those who couldn't find their way out.

This year's maze was a square formation ,which worked better because the sorghum was planted in rows, not randomly.

"I thought it was a lot easier to count," Nicole explained.

Nicole drove home to the farm on weekends, located eight miles southwest of El Dorado, Kan., to help run the maze.

The maze was only open to the public on Fridays and Saturdays but Nicole's mother, Carolyn, allowed tours during the week for school classes and youth groups.

People arrived as far away as Oklahoma and Idaho to visit the maze, but many of the visitors were from nearby Wichita and other surrounding towns.

"Some people came as far as Hesston and Sterling to go through the maze," Nicole said.

Although the maze is closed, the Corbins plan to open another maze next year.

The destroyed maze will be harvested and used as feed for the 180 head of cattle the family own on their dairy farm.

Nicole estimates that $800 was made from the maze and says the money will be divided three ways and used to pay for the girls' school expenses.

"This was just a fun family project," Nicole said. "It was a neat way for us to get some money, and we learned a lot about dealing with the public."

Videos connect Clinton with controversial fund-raisers

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — With hugs, handshakes and slaps on the back, President Clinton got up close and personal with controversial Democratic donors, thanked contributors for supporting his campaign and subtly let them know that they had to keep the cash coming in, videotapes of fund-raising events show.

"Many of you have been very generous. I thank you for it," Clinton told donors at a May 21, 1996, dinner at the White House. But, he quickly added, "This thing could get away from us in a hurry."

Federal law prohibits soliciting donors in government offices.

Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., said the tapes show Clinton's re-election effort violated an election law ban on using soft-money donations to finance advertisements that directly benefited the president's campaign.

On one tape, Clinton tells donors that a Democratic Party TV ad campaign financed by soft-money donations was central to his position in the polls.

Specter said Clinton's comment supports the Republican position that the ads were intended to help the president's re-election and were illegally financed by party money.

Clinton

"The law is plain that there cannot be coordination between the candidate and the party," Specter said. "The quote of the president on the tape really nails it."

On another tape, Clinton is shown telling donors at a March 1996 Michigan fund-raiser that the money would go to his media campaign and coordinated campaign.

More than 100 hours of sought-after tapes of dinners at swanky hotels, White House breakfasts and Saturday radio addresses in the Oval Office were turned over by the White House to Republican investigators Tuesday and Wednesday.

In several shown to reporters in a makeshift screening room at the Old Executive Office Building, Clinton appears alongside Charlie Trie, John Huang, James Riady, Johnny Chung and other Democratic fund-raisers whose activities in the 1996 election thrust their party into controversy.

Trie has left the country, Huang has cited his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination in refusing to be interviewed by investigators and Chung won't cooperate in the probe without a grant of immunity.

But the tapes showed that when Clinton was drumming up financial support for his campaign, the three were welcome in the president's fund-raising circle and acknowledged for their loyalty.

In one clip among the 158 events detailed on the tapes, Clinton is shown hailing Huang as his "good friend." In another, he reminisces with donors about his two-decade friendship with Trie, an Arkansas restaurateur who became a Washington fund-raiser.

"Soon it will be 20 years since I had my first meal with Charlie Trie," Clinton said in a hotel room full of donors on May 19, 1996. "At the time, neither one of us could afford the ticket to this dinner."

Months later, the Democratic Party would be forced to return $3 million in donations — most of it raised by Huang or

Athletic director explains stadium expansion plans

TRAVIS D. LENKNER
staff writer

High demand for student and public football tickets is the main drive behind the proposal to expand KSU Stadium, Athletic Director Max Urick told student senators at their Thursday meeting.

Urick spoke during open period of the meeting to explain the proposal to expand KSU Stadium and the possibility of a per-credit-hour privilege fee to pay for students' portion of the expansion.

Student government guidelines require the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics to guarantee 7,500 student tickets per year. In recent years, however, that number has approached 10,000 because of students' demand for tickets, Urick said.

Urick

This has resulted in fewer general public spectators in the stadium and less revenue, he said, because public tickets produce more profit than student seats. However, Urick said he tries to seat as many students as possible because their support is important to the program.

"Therein lies the bind," he said. "As the public requests more, we fill those orders, and as the students request more, we increase the number of student tickets, but we just run out of room."

Urick said both students and public spectators should be able to sit in the stadium.

"I want you there, but I want the public also. That's why we need to create more seats," he said. "What I want to do is ask the students to what degree they want to participate in the stadium expansion and let the students vote on it. What you say is what we'll do."

The proposed expansion, which would be complete for the 1999 football season, is centered around two plans. Both plans involve the creation of a privilege fee until the 15-year expansion bond is paid off. Urick estimated the final total for the project to be between $10 million and $11 million.

A student vote on the expansion issue has been proposed for Nov. 11. The referendum vote, which the athletic department has offered to finance, would be a binding vote on whether or not students wish to create a fee to finance the construction.

A plebiscite, or non-binding, question could also be on the ballot to allow students who vote for the expansion to specify which of the two plans they prefer. Student Senate has the final say on the amount of the proposed fee, and could also override the results of the referendum with a three-fourths majority vote.

Both expansion proposals involve expanding the upper deck on the stadium's east side. Restrooms and concession stands built in 1962 would also be renovated, and the Dev Nelson Press Box would be expanded to include more luxury suites and club seating, Urick said.

The first of the two proposals suggests a 50-cent per credit hour fee that will not exceed $12 per student per year.

Phil Gramm, senator and former presidential candidate, will be the next in a long line of influential people to visit K-State for the Landon Lecture Series.

The Texas Republican will deliver the 111th Landon Lecture at 2 p.m. today in McCain Auditorium. The topic of Gramm's speech was not available at press time.

Gramm

"The people that we invite, we invite because of their position. Generally, they don't have canned speeches," Charles Reagan, chairman of the Landon Lecture Series, said.

The 52-year-old Gramm served terms in office as both a Democrat and Republican.

He won election to Congress as a democrat in 1978 and was re-elected in 1980 and 1982. During his tenure, Gramm helped write President Reagan's economic program. In response, the Democrats stripped him of his seat on the House Budget Committee.

Gramm resigned from Congress and returned to Texas. He ran to regain his seat in 1983, this time as a Republican. In 1984, he made a successful bid for a Senate seat. In the 1984 election, he received more votes than any other candidate in a statewide election in Texas.

Gramm was re-elected in 1990 with the highest percentage of votes for any Senate candidate in 30 years.

During his tenure in Congress Gramm wrote three pieces of economic reform legislation. He co-wrote the Gramm-Latta Budget, the Gramm-Latta Reconciliation Act and the Gramm-Rudman balanced budget bill. Gramm also led the effort to defeat President Clinton's health care plan.

The senator ran for the Republican presidential nomination in 1996 but dropped out of the race to endorse Bob Dole.

Gramm has built a reputation as a budget hawk. The Gramm-Latta Budget reduced federal spending while strengthening national defense and reducing taxes in 1981. The Gramm-Rudman budget cut the deficit by as much as 40 percent and reduced the size of government by 10 percent between 1985 and 1990.

He also successfully supported legislation to Shipping ban would put crimp in holidays for millions

ASSOCIATED PRESS

LOS ANGELES — The U.S. Maritime Commission's order to bar Japanese ships from U.S. ports could put Uncle Sam in the role of Scrooge to U.S. merchants stocking shelves for the holiday shopping season.

Ports along the West Coast are just wrapping up their holiday rush, with hundreds of millions of dollars worth of holiday goodies — from cameras and computers to stereos — still making its way across the Pacific. Should it last very long, the effect of a shipping embargo would be felt by both retailers and consumers across the nation.

"You have retailers getting their last-minute Christmas goods in. It could have an impact on all of us real quick," said Jack Kyser, chief economist for the Economic Development Corp. of Los Angeles County. "It could take a lot of joy out of the Christmas holidays."

Of the $170 billion in trade passing each year in and out the ports of Los Angeles and Long Beach — the nation's busiest — $45.6 billion is leaving for or coming in from Japan, Kyser said.

The commission ordered the Coast Guard to bar Japanese ships from entering U.S. ports and told the Customs Service to detain those already at berth. Formal orders were not expected to reach the agencies until Friday afternoon, and the White House asked the commission to consider delaying enforcement while officials tried to work out a compromise.

News of the order came as a shock to members of the shipping community.

"That's the sort of thing you do when you go to war with a country," Jay Winter, executive secretary of the Steamship Association of Southern California.

Port operations along the West Coast continued without interruption Thursday. There were four Japanese-owned ships in the Los Angeles-Long Beach harbor complex, but one was scheduled to depart later in the day and another was scheduled to leave Friday. Operations also were normal at the Port of Oakland, where two Japanese ships were at berth.

Customs spokesman Mike Flemming said the agency would not act until it received an order.

"Vessels are coming and going at will. There's no restriction," said Capt. Manny Ashmeyer of Marine Exchange, which monitors traffic in the ports of Los Angeles and Long Beach.

193 soldiers return from Bosnia

Task Force 1-41 and the 977th Military Police Company returned home to Fort Riley from Bosnia Thursday afternoon.

Spouses, children and friends have waited six months for this day. The troops' arrival time was rescheduled seven times in two days; family members were kept abreast of news through family support personnel and word of mouth.

Maj. Gen. Michael Dodson, commanding officer of Fort Riley, was on hand to welcome home the troops during a short ceremony in Hangar 817 on Marshall Field.

The troops will receive a few days off to relax and then go back to work. A majority of the soldiers will take a few weeks leave during mid-November.

This is the second group of soldiers in the task force to return. There are still about 700 soldiers waiting to come home. Another group of soldiers might return as early as Saturday, but military officials have not yet received flight confirmations.

The task force was in Bosnia to support U.S. troops participating in Operation Joint Guard.

KC bus system mixing cow fat with diesel to make cleaner fuel

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The city bus system is experimenting with a mixture of diesel fuel and cow fat to produce what apparently is a much cleaner fuel.

Working on a U.S. Department of Energy grant, the Area Transportation Authority is believed to be the first in the country to try the mixture, which is supposed to reduce harmful emissions into the environment.

The fuel is one of a family of biodiesel fuels that combine agriculture-based sources such as vegetable oil, corn oil, pork lard and soybean with diesel. The cow fat version smells like watered-down gasoline, and its color is light gold.

Use of the beef tallow could have the economic benefits of providing area farmers with a market and creating jobs for processing the fat.

The biodiesel blend used by the ATA is made up of 80 percent diesel fuel and 20 percent beef tallow. The National Biodiesel Board said biodiesel fuels reduce carbon monoxide by 21 percent, particulate matter by 31 percent and total hydrocarbons by 47 percent compared with diesel fuel.

Wichita school district settles suits involving special education

WICHITA — The Wichita school board said canceling speech and occupational therapy programs last fall was a mistake, and it settled two class-action lawsuits involving special education students.

The district will offer summer programs to help students make up the year of missed classes. The board settled the two lawsuits Monday night and agreed to pay $115,000 in legal fees.

District officials informed the parents of about 200 students last fall that the children would no longer be able to receive speech or occupational therapy.

Some of the parents protested the change, saying the district couldn't legally end education programs that were required in each child's Individualized Education Plans, a yearly program required by law for every special education student.

Kansas Advocacy and Protective Service, a private, nonprofit group that is an advocate for special education children, filed the suits in May challenging the district's elimination of the program. The district reinstituted the program shortly after the suits were filed.

Police say kidnapped 4-year-old forced to smoke crack

POMPANO BEACH, Fla. — A convicted sex offender told police he lured a 4-year-old girl to an abandoned building, where she was molested and forced to smoke crack.

"She was foaming from the mouth and incoherent, completely incoherent, when we got there," police spokeswoman Sandra King said Wednesday. "We had no idea what had happened to this child other than something terrible had gone wrong."

Jeffrey Lee Robinson, who police said has a history of sexually abusing children, was arrested nearby soon after the girl was found Tuesday. He was charged with kidnapping, lewd and lascivious assault, indecent assault and aggravated child abuse.

Police said Robinson, 44, told investigators that he forced the girl to fondle him and someone else made her smoke crack. No one else was at the abandoned boarding house when police arrived.

The girl remained in serious but stable condition.

RILEY COUNTY

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 15

- At 5:45 p.m., Riley County Police Department received a report of arson of a vehicle in 424 9th St., Ogden, Kan. According to a press release from RCPD, an investigation revealed that David Lee Brown intentionally set the car on fire because of a domestic dispute between himself and his wife. The release said Brown was going toward Manhattan with a .22-caliber rifle, possibly with an intent to harm someone.

RCPD officers found the vehicle. Officers attempted to stop Brown with sirens and emergency lights, but he did not stop. The officers then pursued him south on Scenic Drive and then west on Wildcat Creek Road.

North of the intersection of Wildcat Creek Road and Eureka Drive, one of the police cars and Brown's car collided. The police car sustained damage to the back fender and Brown's car had minor damage to the left rear tail light.

David Lee Brown was taken into custody at the scene of the accident and was arrested for the following charges: aggravated assault on a law enforcement officer, criminal threats, arson, criminal use of a weapon, defacing identification marks of a firearm, and attempting to flee and elude a law enforcement officer. Bond was set at $25,000, and Brown is confined in Riley County Jail.

- At 8:50 p.m., Alison F. Hagan, 2104 Mike Place, was arrested on a Pottawatomie County warrant for worthless checks. Bond was set at $320.50.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 16

- At 2:32 a.m., Kevin L. Rieschick, Soldier, Kan., was arrested for DUI. Bond was set at $500.
- At 2:41 a.m., Robert A. Phillips II, Haymaker 718, was arrested for DUI. Bond was set at $500.
- At 2:57 p.m., Lindy McReynolds, 3212 Ella Lane, was arrested on a Riley County warrant for failure to appear. Bond was set at $872.
- At 3:50 p.m., Leo A. Lefay, 709 Dondee Drive, Apt. 11, was arrested on a Riley County warrant for lewd and lascivious behavior, two counts. Bond was set at $500.

BODY BUILDING

Greek houses fine-tune body-building performances for tonight's finals

KERRY BOYDSTON
staff reporter

Daring diamond-head stunts, dazzling dancers and yelling collegians filled Ahearn Field House on Wednesday night for the annual body-building Homecoming competition's preliminary round.

"Homecoming week is so much fun because houses can finally show everyone what they have been spending so much time working on," Jennifer Gorman, Panhellenic Council president, said.

"Body building especially takes a lot of time and dedication on behalf of each house and residence hall. Since Homecoming is a little earlier this year, houses and halls had to start practicing for this event even earlier. Some began at the beginning of school," she said.

Body building is exactly what it sounds like. Participants create routines that can include cheers, stunts and dancing set to music. These routines are performed on a mat in front of spectators in Ahearn. Groups can also have extra members stand around the mat and cheer with the music.

The routine must be less than five minutes long.

"Competition is always very strong, and when you are under a time restraint, it just adds that much more pressure," Gorman said.

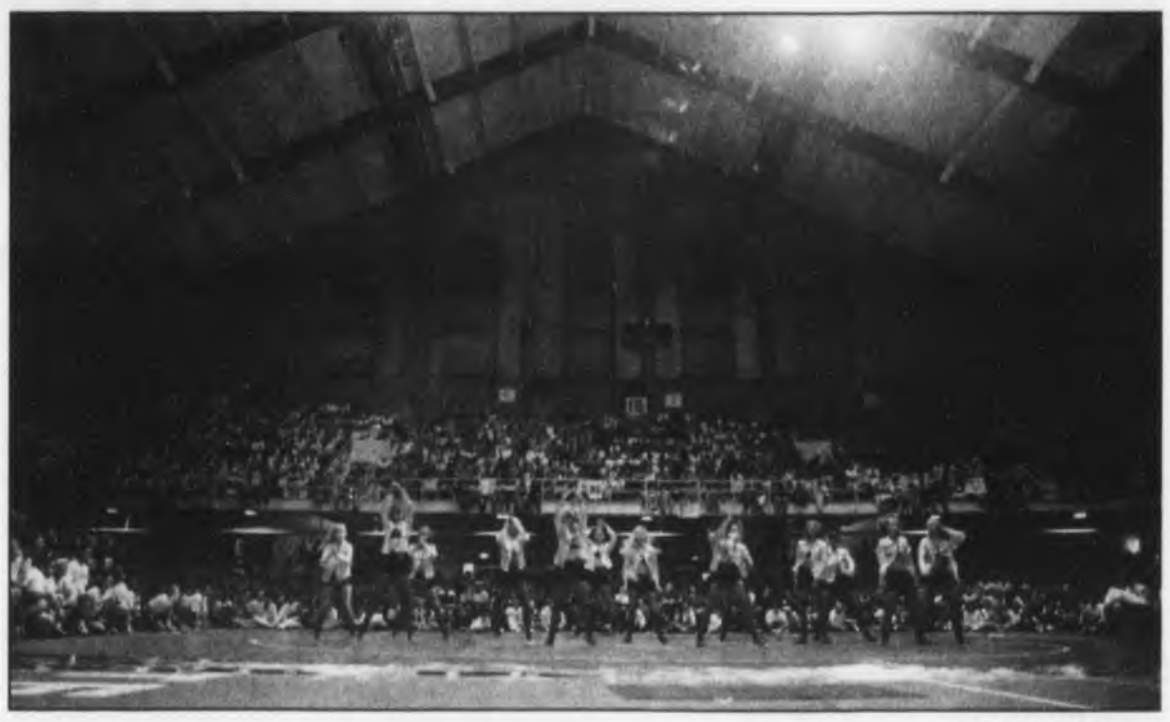
"We have judges that ranked the residence halls and also chose the top five sororities and fraternities who now move on to the finals Friday night," she said.

Jami Nelson, Homecoming coordinator, said the judges are knowledgeable of the event they are judging.

"They aren't just people off the street," she said. "They know their stuff and know what to look for in routines."

All time spent working on these routines came down to one performance in the preliminary round. Now, only five groups remain.

"Unfortunately, we didn't make it to the final round," Katie Reardon, member of Kappa Kappa Gamma, said. "It's really hard to see all the time and effort be put into body building by a house and then not make it past the preliminary round."



"But I had the best time cheering on our house and we would like to wish all the other houses in the finals the best of luck."

Bowhunting courses teach younger archers safety, ethics

DAVID FAIRBANKS
city editor

Archery deer season is here, and with the implementation of a new state law, a younger faction of hunters can now take to the tree-stands.

More info?
For bowhunting class information, call Dennis Wilson at (785) 456-8555.

This new law lowered the age limit for archery deer hunters to 12- and 13-year-olds. According to the Kansas Department of Wildlife and Parks, all they have to be able to do is pull the mandatory 45-pound draw-weight bow.

Dennis Wilson, bowhunter education instructor, said the new law shouldn't apply to all 12- to 13-year- olds.

"I think in some instances it's good, and not so good in others," he said, "Some 12- to 13-year-old kids aren't mature enough to be out there. I think it's up to the parents to decide if they're ready or not."

Although the course is mandatory for children age 12 to 13, it is also recommended to anyone who bowhunts.

Ross Robins, hunter education coordinator for the Kansas Department of Wildlife and Parks, said taking the class isn't a bad idea.

"Everyone should know a little about the sport and what they're doing, for safety concerns and so they feel comfortable," he said.

Robins also said taking only the bowhunter course isn't enough for the 12- to 13-year-olds who want to hunt. It is also mandatory for them to have taken the regular hunter safety course.

Each year the Kansas Department of Wildlife and Parks certifies 13,000 people through the traditional hunter safety course and only about 400 in bowhunting education, Robins said.

He said that while firearm hunting is more popular, making the bowhunting classes available could increase the popularity of archery deer season.

Dennis Wilson will be instructing a bowhunting class on Sunday at the Kaw Valley Archery Range in Wamego. Wilson said he'll cover safety, shot placement, hunting methods, hunting law, ethics and first aid.

If you'd like to pre-register for the course or just want more information, call Dennis Wilson at (785) 456-8555.

DAV Aggie Outlet offers thrifty options for students short on cash, transportation

TONYA ALLOWAY
staff reporter

Sarah Wacker, senior in biology and education, and Daniel Wacker, freshman in theater, were going to eat lunch in Aggieville when they saw Aggie Outlet, a new thrift store owned by the Disabled American Veterans Inc. of Kansas.

Daniel Wacker said he is from Denver, where thrift stores are a dime a dozen. He said Aggie Outlet has a wide selection, the right size clothing and good prices.

"In Denver, they hike up the prices because that's the fashion," he said. "Here, the prices are phenomenal, and they have stuff that doesn't suck."

Sarah Wacker said she was looking at the baby clothes because her sister is going to have a baby. "You can get good items for babies, and cheap onezies here," she said.

Bob Brandenburg, manager of the DAV thrift stores, said the DAV Aggie Outlet opened Oct. 1 in an attempt to reach more college students. The idea was that college students don't have a lot of money, and many students don't have vehicles to reach the main store downtown.

Brandenburg said the idea for the satellite store in Aggieville came from having been a college student himself and knowing how hard it is to make ends meet.

"Aggie Outlet is designed specifically to serve the college market," Brandenburg said. "We know that college students need a place to shop that provides quality merchandise at affordable prices.

The store carries clothing, luggage, furniture, exercise equipment, kitchenware, appliances, knickknacks and other items.

The DAV is a nonprofit organization dedicated to disabled veterans and their families. Brandenburg said the money from the thrift stores pays the salary of professional service officers at DAV hospitals.

Cathy Coffee, employee at DAV thrift store, said business has been picking up this week, and that a lot of college students have been in to look around and make purchases.

"Everybody has different tastes," Coffee said. "People need to come down and see us."

Aggie Outlet is at 1126 Laramie St. and is open from 11 a.m. to 7 p.m. Tuesday through Saturday. Donations can be made to the thrift stores at the main location at 322 Houston St.

Speakers put K-State's Landon Lecture series in nation's spotlight

Two words: Landon Lecture.

Three names: William Cohen, Phil Gramm and Sam Donaldson.

Put them together, and you have a semester full of one of the highest quality lecture series in the country.

History makers, view shapers, heroes and enlighteners have all graced our university with their insight on issues facing the world and life in general. What a wonderful asset to have at this Midwestern school, deep in the heart of our nation. Not only is the series a great idea, and a successful one at that, but the immeasurable quality of each of its guests is an element that should be greatly appreciated.

William Cohen, the U.S. secretary of defense, is a lawyer, a former three-time Republican senator for the state of Maine, has written nine books and is in charge of running the Pentagon in Washington, D.C. He is a man of true fiber.

Phil Gramm, a Texas senator who has served the public as both a Republican and a Democrat, helped cut our national deficit by nearly 40 percent and reduced our government by 10 percent between 1985 and 1990. He holds a doctorate. in economics and has taught at fellow Big 12 school Texas A&M. He is a shaper of American government.

Sam Donaldson, a 30-year veteran of "ABC News" and co-anchor of two network news programs, brought us earth-shattering coverage of the Vietnam War, Watergate, the Persian Gulf War and the crash of TWA Flight 800. He is the recipient of a George Foster Peabody Award and three Emmy Awards. He has written an international best-seller and will be in McCain Auditorium on Nov. 21 to deliver the 112th Landon Lecture. He is the eyes and ears of our society.

If you missed the first one, there are two left this semester — one of them this afternoon. Go to these lectures. Listen to the best. Be thankful for the opportunity.

life would be great if we could go straight from sixth grade to eighth grade and avoid

7th HELL

BRANDI HERTIG

BRANDI HERTIG is a sophomore in print journalism and English/creative writing. You can send your e-mail comments to Brandi at blh0377@ksu.edu.

It's 11:15 p.m. on a Sunday night. I'm clicking the wintergreen Tic-Tacs into their little display boxes at Dillons, when suddenly I am back in the seventh grade for the third time that weekend.

That poignant Wilson Phillips song, "Hold On," (now only available on such compilations as "Greatest Love Songs of the Unfortunate-but-Real Early 1990s") is wafting through the air like the scent of the floor wax the cleaning guy is using to buff the floor in aisle eight. I am in the gym of the Newton Recreation Center at a seventh- and eighth-grade dance. I am standing on the sidelines, watching the other girls get felt up.

Now this whole weird, trippy flashback thing wouldn't have been so bad if it hadn't happened the day before as well. The previous Saturday, I got a good chunk of my hair whacked off, leaving it as short as it was back in the seventh grade. And, as I fought my way out of Manhattan Town Center, I made a stop at Mr. Bulky's for a giant jawbreaker, the kind I used to lick my tongue raw on, back in the day.

Seventh grade. Is there really a more chagrine-filled time, overflowing with acne and general confusion about the new placement of body hair? Is there a more cruel and unusual occurrence of nature that aligns that wretched grade with the time when one's life is guided by haywire hormones and lethal amounts of Tribe perfume?

No. Really, trust me. If you come from one of those enlightened countries that has done away with the seventh grade altogether, then you have to take this on faith. If you'd rather test this yourself, try this little number: watch a lot of "Blossom" reruns, wear a lot of poorly placed make-up, try to shave things that just don't need shaving and read magazines like Seventeen and Sassy.

Do this for a week, and when you get the shakes you'll certainly be on the road to understanding.

Not that any of us were consulted on the matter when it was up for votes, but our forefolk must have thought humiliation goes down much better in one huge dose rather than in bite-sized pieces. Seventh grade is when you have to take those naked showers with your peers, learn all about body parts you didn't even know you had and deal with the bitter taste of love gone wrong just because Marc thought Kandra was cuter and had bigger boobs than you, then you tried to break them up, but then — oh, nevermind.

My theory is that parents and school faculty get together every year to discuss new and innovative ways to make the onset of puberty most embarrassing, at home and in the classroom. Parent/Teacher Organization meetings probably go a little something like this:

Parent: Well, little Carrie came to me the other day and said she thought maybe she would need a box of tampons.

(The group sighs collectively at the beauty of nature.)

Parent continues: So I took her and her brother Todd to the store, slipped Carrie a few dollars, then made the two of them make the purchase.

(Applause breaks out at the parent's obvious innovation.)

Teacher: Wonderful! You got both kids in one whack! Now that's just some smart thinking. Smart thinking. Let's see them try to function normally now.

The thinking behind this is, no matter how repressed these parents and teachers were in their day, their goal is to make sure the next generation gets it worse. It's a bitterness issue, really.

The rules that make up the structure of your ordinary seventh-grade classroom usually revolve around the necessity to ask permission to do much of anything. But doe any self-respecting huma really enjoy getting up and a ing the teacher if a trip to the let is feasible? It's just one degrading thing these poor cent kids have to endure on to adulthood.

What's worse is when t denies permission.

That raises another issue should one human being be power over another's bodily Especially to an already d seventh grader?

So — as if you didn't see coming — I move we abolish enth grade altogether. Let's re the benefits to be reaped such a savvy move.

- No more naked sho complete with chastising one's peers.
- Those gangly years of pu ty will give way to a much simpler process of development: birth-childhood-adult. Cutting out that middle man can save time, money and razor blades.
- An end to the monopoly Oxy has on the puberty market. It's time to end the shameless corporate gluttony.
- World peace shall ensue thanks to normal levels of hormones for all. It'll be like "Brave New World," minus the socia rankings, test tubes and general chaos.

As for those of who have already suffered the slings and arrows of seventh grade, the answer is one fold and quite apparent.

Wilson Phillips. And lots of it.

Keeping the headphones ON

Unpopular taste in music can lead to a lot of criticism.

KELLY FURNAS

KELLY FURNAS is a sophomore in print journalism. You can send e-mail to Kelly at krf5663@ksu.edu.

I suppose you could call my taste in music a bit odd.

I prefer to call it broad.

My friends think I go out of my way to like songs that are unpopular. They say I'm trying too hard to be different, or that I'm just trying to make them mad.

But I disagree. Sure, my music preferences are unusual, but they are indeed what I prefer to listen to — whether I'm in a group or alone. I'm only trying to please myself, and I do that with a variety of music.

Perhaps it is the variety that people find irritating. My collection of music includes show tunes, 1980s rock, operas and classical music. Not too bad? Well, it also includes artists such as Garth Brooks, Marilyn Manson, Tupac Shakkur, the Spice Girls and, gasp, Hanson. How's that for variety?

Right away, people notice I don't jump on the mainstream "alternative" bandwagon. For some reason, I have a hard time enjoying today's most popular music. While I'll be the first to admit that the lyrics that accompany alternative songs are usually deeper and more meaningful than "MMMBop," I really miss catchy tunes, the identifying melody and the three-part harmony, which my music provides.

While liking Hanson's music is what I get the most grief for, it is also what I am the most militant in defending. People seem so quick to dismiss this band's music just because it was written and performed by some children from Oklahoma. The truth is I enjoyed listening to "MMMBop" before I even knew that males were behind the microphones. It was the harmony and the tempo that made me enjoy listening to the song, and that's what made me eventually buy Hanson's album.

That's what separates me from a lot of the people I know. Everything I like about a musical artist is limited to his or her music. I don't really care erform live, and I'm not impressed by a group's music care about is what I'll hear on the radio in my car. I'm in a group of people, I'm usually asked to put on taste in music is so unpopular that people will unplug my compact discs from me. Once, I had all of my CDs my car, and later some of my more unusual selections rned to me anonymously. I guess hoodlums have a hard elling "Les Misérables" on the street.

But what really irks me has nothing to do with other people's tastes in music. On the contrary, I think people should listen to bands such as Billy Goat as loud as they want. Heck, I'll even mosh with them if I'm in the appropriate mood. I just wish they would extend me the same courtesy and sing a few songs from the Spice Girls.

What I'm really looking for is a bit more tolerance. I was getting the same sort of harassment about four years ago when I would blast music from "The Lion King" everywhere. Then, when it won Oscars for best song and best score, people seemed to cut me some slack. People are a lot less damaging in their criticism when they are arguing against international awards.

Unfortunately, I can't wait until Hanson wins a Grammy before I listen to the band's album again.

So in the meantime, I ask for a little bit of understanding and a lot of restraint.

That's what I want. It's what I really, really want.

Halls very enthusiastic about Homecoming

Editor,

I'd like to respond to the editorial board in Wednesday's Collegian regarding participation in Homecoming. You said, "the residence halls do participate, but only in a feeble attempt." Spend some time in the halls, and you'll find anything but a feeble attempt.

In planning Homecoming for West Hall, I was distressed that no information was passed on to me from the Kansas State University Association of Residence Halls, but that was because ARH had not yet received the information.

We received our rules and guidelines less than a month before Homecoming, by which time we had missed several of the mandatory informational meetings.

When we finally did start attending the meetings, hardly a glance was given at the residence halls. Greek policies were clearly laid out, but residence hall policies were ignored.

I fully agree that participation in Homecoming should be for everyone, not just because you might be fined an obscene amount of money. Take a look at the residence halls and their enthusiastic residents who take the time to participate. Kudos to you all.

Blood drive successful

Editor,

I would like to thank the entire student body, faculty, staff and community members who participated in the K-State vs. the University of Kansas blood drive last week. On behalf of the American Red Cross Central Blood region, we'd like to thank everyone involved in helping us surpass our goal of 725 pints.

The battle between KU and K-State this year was great. KU put up a great fight with 675 pints.

K-State had a total of 879 pints. We feel our numbers would have been higher, but because of to the time constraint of donating, some people were unable to give this fall.

The Federal Drug Administration has recently enforced new standards and procedures that the American Red Cross Blood Services must perform on each potential donor. This process was put into action to keep the blood supply safe and helps eliminate possible risks to workers and recipients.

The process should take an hour and a half, but might take longer depending on the donor. We are looking into this situation for the future in hopes to reduce the time it takes to donate.

It is important to the blood supply that all potential donors participate in each blood drive in order to maintain the supply for people who need it most.

Again, thanks to everyone who donated this fall. We get to keep the traveling trophy here in Manhattan for another year. We hope to have another great turnout in the spring.

Council seeks input about parking garage

KRIS ROBL
staff reporter

The Council on Parking Operations is looking for parking garage input from K-State students and faculty.

The council met Thursday to discuss the plans for the project. Parking Services recently turned in a proposal for the Manhattan Comprehensive Transportation Study.

"Now we have to tell the city what we want," said John Lambert, director of public safety.

Lambert said his main goal is to get feedback from sessions and forums that will be later in the semester. Council members stressed the importance of getting students and faculty to attend these forums.

Darwin Abbott, director of Parking Services, said a new parking-shuttle bus had been purchased by Parking Services. The shuttle cost about $30,000 and will be put to use as soon as the license plates are processed.

Abbott also said parking services at K-State-Salina is trying to improve its overall parking condition.

"Their view was that we were jamming our regulations into them, which is not what we are trying to do," Abbott said.

Kim Sanchez, office assistant at K-State-Salina, said the university was also trying to improve its parking conditions but would need help.

"We're going to have a lot of questions, and we will be needing some help structurally," Sanchez said.

Lambert suggested the parking services at K-State-Salina think about increasing its $20 parking fee.

"A $20 parking permit will not solve all their problems," Lambert said.

The council also discussed the possibility of purchasing 10 hand-held computers for parking citations. Bids on computers are still being accepted in order to find the lowest price.

Abbott also said Parking Services' online site has been updated. A campus conference and high school orientation schedule were added to inform parking users that the parking lots might be full on these particular dates.

"One-hundred and fifty stalls will be blocked off in West Stadium parking lot during these occasions," Abbott said.

Another feature added to the online site is vehicle registration.

"If all goes well, we hope to register students and then bill them for their permit," Abbott said.

Students then would have to print out the form, sign it and mail it to Parking Services.

Arrests made for theft of military weapons

ASSOCIATED PRESS

CHARLOTTE, N.C. — Six Marines from Camp Lejeune and seven civilians were arrested Thursday in a nationwide investigation into the theft of military weapons, including rocket launchers, machine guns, mines, mortars and grenades.

Federal undercover agents bought large quantities of weapons and ammunition during an 18-month operation, said William Perry, special agent in charge of the FBI's Charlotte office.

"The military came to us a while back and said, 'We have a problem,'" said Neil Robbins, special agent in charge of the Naval Criminal Investigative Service.

Investigators executed five search warrants Thursday morning before the arrests. Four of the searches took place in North Carolina. The fifth was at the home of a Marine in Millis, Mass., about 30 miles southwest of Boston.

Authorities cordoned off the area around the suspect's home and seized at least 10 boxes and crates with military markings, said Jeff Morrow, assistant special agent with the NCIS.

The green metal boxes found in the basement were filled with mortars, grenades and other ammunition, Morrow said. The suspect, whose name was not released, recently moved to Millis with his wife and children after a transfer from Lejeune.

Neighbor Ellie Jarvis said she was told to leave her home after federal agents said they found explosives in the suspect's house.

"I thought 'Oh my God. My daughter has played next door at that house. What do you mean explosives?'" she said.

The five Marines arrested in North Carolina were being held at Lejeune.

The seven North Carolina civilians who were arrested were charged with a variety of offenses stemming from the illegal manufacture and distribution of weapons, particularly automatic weapons. An eighth suspect was still being sought.

In Washington, Secretary of Defense William Cohen said he asked the armed services to review their security procedures and report back to him in 30 days.

"It is imperative that we be confident that military arms and ammunitions are tightly controlled and safeguarded," Cohen said.

New policy alters responsibilities of state's pregnant police officers

ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON — When Boston police Detective Kathleen O'Toole disclosed to her supervisors 10 years ago that she was pregnant, they let her decide when to exchange her beat for an office job.

They didn't ask if she could run up 10 flights of stairs, mow the stationhouse lawn or rope a horse and pull it off the roadway.

Today, O'Toole, now the state's secretary of public safety, has to come up with a new policy on pregnant troopers after some officers complained that they were pulled off the beat because they couldn't complete such tasks.

The physical requirements became mandatory in April, and the state police physician — not the woman's doctor — was put in charge of determining when a pregnant officer should be put on modified duty. Officers on modified duty can't walk the beat, make traffic stops or even drive police vehicles.

That's a big change from when O'Toole was pregnant. She was allowed to drive her unmarked police car to the office and had a say in choosing her work — teaching cadets and running background checks on prospective employees.

"I felt like a valued employee," she said. "I didn't have to shelve my career for nine months, and I was able to work until the day before I had the baby."

Four veteran investigators complained to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission that the new policy was unfair. On Wednesday, acting Gov. Paul Cellucci ordered O'Toole's office to rewrite the rules.

"The one about moving the cow off the road was a little ridiculous, in my view," Cellucci said. "We should not have policies that basically put these roadblocks in the way of working

'South Pacific' novelist dies

ASSOCIATED PRESS

AUSTIN, Texas — James A. Michener, who guided millions of readers from the South Pacific to the fringes of space in giant, best-selling novels, died Thursday. He was 90.

Longtime friend and assistant John Kings said the author died of renal failure at his home in Austin. Last week, Michener ordered doctors to disconnect him from life-sustaining kidney dialysis.

Michener

"His loss will be great not only for the literary scene, but to the many colleges he has nurtured through the years and the many thousands of people who feel he is their friend," Kings said.

Michener's heralded writing career, which spanned nearly 50 years, began in his mid-life with "Tales of the South Pacific." The book, written during his tour of duty with the Navy in World War II, won the Pulitzer Prize in 1948 and was the basis for "South Pacific," a long-running Broadway musical and later a motion picture.

Michener then spent decades wandering the globe, from Japan and Korea to Hungary, Hawaii, Afghanistan, Spain, South Africa, Colorado, Israel, Chesapeake Bay, Poland, Texas, Alaska and the Caribbean.

He wrote historical-geographic blockbusters, living in and absorbing the culture of the places of which he wrote. His books argued for universal ideals: religious and racial tolerance, hard work and self-reliance.

"I'm not a stylist," Michener said of his writing style. "There are a whole lot of things I'm not good at. I'm not hard in dialogue I don't have that wonderful crispness. I don't think I'm good at psychology. But what I can do is put a good narrative together and hold the reader's interest."

Every one of his books was a commercial success. The first printing of his 1985 novel, "Texas," was 750,000 copies. It eventually sold more than 1 million copies.

Michener never quit working.

"As long as the old brain keeps functioning, I know the desire will always be there. I can hardly wait to get up in the morning, to get back to work," he said.

He released his latest book, "A Century of Sonnets," earlier this year and reportedly was working on a book about his illness.

Michener was born on Feb. 3, 1907, in New York City, and was taken as an orphan to the Bucks County Poorhouse in Doylestown, Pa. His name, James Albert Michener, came from his adoptive Quaker parents, Edwin and Mabel Michener.

A funeral will be Tuesday in Austin, Kings said. Memorial services were planned to take place in Austin and New York at a later time.

Michener will be cremated and buried alongside his wife, Kings said.

Bodyguard joins crash investigation

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Bodyguard Trevor Rees-Jones has formally joined the investigation into the crash that injured him and killed Princess Diana, Dodi Fayed and their driver, French judicial sources said Thursday.

Rees-Jones

By joining the investigation as a civil party, Rees-Jones, the only survivor of the Aug. 31 crash, would have access to all court papers. Should criminal charges be filed, Rees-Jones could seek damages against the defendant — whoever it might be.

Diana's family, as well as relatives of the driver and Fayed, who was her companion, are also civil parties to the case.

Medical experts consulted by a French judge also have advised that memory lapses like Rees-Jones' amnesia about the accident are rarely reversible, according to the judicial sources in Paris, speaking on condition of anonymity.

Rees-Jones spent more than a month in a French hospital and was under heavy anesthesia during operations to repair his jaw, which was severely injured in the crash.

Rees-Jones has filed a civil suit and, under French law, he can no longer be interrogated by investigators except in the presence of his lawyer, the judicial sources said.

During two interrogations, Rees-Jones was able to remember some details of what happened before the accident, but was unable to remember the crash itself.

Rees-Jones, a 29-year-old former paratrooper, left France for England on Oct. 3.

In another development, the sources said Bernard Dartevelle, who is representing the Fayed family, has asked the judge to give him access to all videos taken by banks, government offices or news organizations on the route the Mercedes took from the Ritz hotel to the spot where it crashed.

No charges have been filed in the case, but prosecutors are investigating the role of nine photographers and one motorcycle courier who had been pursuing Diana's car. Investigators are also looking for a small car, possibly a Fiat Uno, that might have collided with the Mercedes and caused the driver to lose control.

Henri Paul, the 41-year-old driver of the car, was legally drunk and on prescription drugs at the time of the crash.

Meanwhile, a judge lifted restrictions on one of the photographers named as suspects in the case, allowing him to work and leave French territory, judicial sources said.

Christian Martinez, of the Angeli photo agency, had been unable to work as a journalist since being placed under formal investigation Sept. 2 on allegations of manslaughter and failing to help persons in danger, a crime in France.

Another photographer, Romuald Rat of Gamma, was released from similar restrictions 10 days ago. Rat and Martinez were the only suspects among the 10 who had to post bail — $16,000 — and were forbidden from working as journalists pending resolution of the case.

The Ride Of Your Life.

Win a 7-day trip for two to the 1998 PBR Finals at the MGM Grand in Las Vegas.

What's it really like to ride a bull? Well, Double-H Boots and the Hart Brothers, J.W. and Cody, are going to make sure that two rodeo fans find out.

If you're the lucky winner of Double-H Boots' "The Ride Of Your Life" contest, you'll get an insider's view of professional bull riding. You'll stay in style at the MGM Grand, have dinner with J.W. and Cody, box seats, VIP passes, an official chute tour at the PBR Finals and more.

But, like bull riding, you gotta enter to win. So just come by the store before December 1st and fill out an entry form. No purchase is necessary. But, while you're here, you might want to try on a pair of Double-H boots. Someone is going to win—it could be you!

Family matters

Siblings influence one another to join Student Senate

SARA MARTIN
staff writer

When Robin Cates, junior in social work, entered the Student Senate chamber each Thursday last year, she knew big sister was watching. Literally.

Cates and several other senators share the common bond of having been persuaded by an older sibling to join the ranks of student government.

Many of them had a background in high school politics, but all were influenced by their family members to make the commitment. For Cates, her older sister, Julie Cates, senior in kinesiology, influenced her.

"My sister sort of almost drug me into the office to turn in my intern application," said Robin Cates, who attended Senate meetings with her sister while she was still in high school and was visiting campus. "She had told me that it was a lot of fun, and since she has always given me good advice, here I am."

> Our relationship in Senate is a lot more professional. We don't bicker and fight in there. If we're mad at each oter, it ends when we walk into the Big 12 Room.
>
> • Jill Hayhurst
> arts and sciences senator

However, Jill Hayhurst, junior in communication sciences and disorders, said she knows she was only partly responsible for the political involvement of her sister, Sara Hayhurst, sophomore in business accounting and Spanish.

"We both always did stuff like this in high school, so I don't know if she was a big reason I got involved," Sara Hayhurst said. "She was a great connection, though, and it made me more aware to know someone who was involved on campus."

Younger siblings have found having an experienced relative on their side who is willing to be a mentor is a great advantage, Julie Cates said. There are other benefits as well.

"Sometimes if people in the chamber know someone in your family, they're more willing to listen to you," Cates said.

Senate Chair Jeff Dougan, senior in electrical engineering, looked to his brother Mike Dougan, junior in electrical engineering, to present ideas. They discussed potential topics and talked through all of the issues being addressed in the chamber.

Mike Dougan was a senator during the 1996-97 school year.

Siblings have also been known to take advantage of the benefits of family loyalty.

"The other day, I wanted to give a debate, but they were going to move to question," Jill Hayhurst said. "I yelled to Sara across the room, and she voted against it for me."

Julie Cates said people in Senate have come to expect antics such as those, and are often surprised when siblings don't vote the same way every time. However, it is frequent that brothers and sisters take the same sides.

"It is very interesting how we vote because we are alike in so many ways," Jill Hayhurst said. "It's weird because in Senate, people vote with others the same all of the time. Sara and I tend to hang out with different people, and yet we still vote a lot alike."

When siblings do disagree on issues and vote differently, arguments can occur. Jill Hayhurst compared her relationship with her other friends with that with her sister and said if she and a nonrelative vote differently in chamber, it is forgotten quickly.

Her relationship with her sister outside of class can sometimes be affected, Jill Hayhurst said. However, the two don't let that affect them in meetings.

"Our relationship in Senate is a lot more professional," Jill Hayhurst said. "We don't bicker and fight in there. If we're mad at each other, it ends when we walk into the Big 12 Room."

Even when siblings can overlook their personal problems, other senators sometimes make a big issue about the relationships of the brothers and sisters in chambers.

"I will never forget when I became an intern," Robin Cates said. "It was like, 'The only reason Robin got in was because of her sister,' and it really, really irritated me."

However, those thoughts, along with the occasional teasing, were never meant to be damaging, Robin Cates said. It is still difficult, though, to find a place of their own within the chamber, she said.

Sara Hayhurst agreed with the younger Cates.

"Establishing your own position gets tough," Sara Hayhurst said. "Still, I'm known as Little Hay, but a lot of people recognize that everyone wants to establish their own identity."

Sometimes, Sara Hayhurst said, it was difficult to have their own identities because things in the chamber got confusing when names are being called. Both she and her sister were addressed as Senator Hayhurst, and more often than not, they would answer simultaneously. Sara Hayhurst said she tries not to make that old mistake, so she can avoid the teasing she received.

Robin Cates said she also thinks younger siblings should pay extra attention to avoid slip-ups in identities.

"Make yourself distinct," she said. "Don't just be so-and-so's little sister."

Painless needle cures patients' dental phobia

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Jennifer Simon's voice still quivers as she recalls childhood dental visits that sound like the torture scene in "Marathon Man."

Her dentist — like the sadist played by Laurence Olivier in the movie — pierced her mouth with a harpoon-like needle, drilled before the Novocain took effect and called her a baby when she cried out in pain.

"He was creepy," said Simon, 27. "When I was an adult I didn't go for 3 1/2 years, until my parents and my boyfriend said they weren't going to celebrate my birthday if I didn't."

> I didn't feel the pain that you usually feel when you have a Novocain injection. More important, I didn't feel paralyzed in my mouth when I returned to work.
>
> • Joel Glass
> New York cleaning company executive

Now, she says her dental phobia is cured after her new dentist used a new computer-controlled "painless" needle a New Jersey company plans to make widely available starting Saturday.

Milestone Scientific Inc. claims its $1,000 device will put more people in dentists' chairs. And because it's precise enough to work on a single tooth, it doesn't send patients away with the telltale droopy cheeks and muffled speech.

"It really is actually painless," Simon said. "You don't feel the needle going in at all."

Her dentist, Michael Krochak, explained that what hurts is not the needle prick itself, but the feeling of having anesthetic forced into tissues faster than it can be absorbed.

The Wand, as the Milestone system is called, starts off with a drop of anesthetic to numb the needle site and delivers the rest at a slow, regular pace. It can numb a site as small as the area surrounding a single tooth, instead of half a patient's mouth.

"I honestly believe that fear of dental injections will become a thing of the past," said Krochak, who demonstrated the device on a reporter Thursday at the Nasdaq stock market, where Milestone is traded.

For dentists — and their patients — fear can be expensive.

It keeps some patients from getting routine check-ups. Others need more tending to before and after shots. By making injections quick and painless, the nation's 135,000 dentists — who give an average of seven to 10 injections daily — can save enough time to squeeze in another patient per day, said Michael McGeehan, executive vice president of Livingston, N.J.-based Milestone.

"I didn't feel the pain that you usually feel when you have a Novocain injection," said Joel Glass, a New York cleaning company executive who in the past has had to give slack-jawed company presentations after dental visits. "More important, I didn't feel paralyzed in my mouth when I returned to work. I have to be available to talk."

Milestone, which plans to start selling the Wand nationally after introducing it at the American Dental Association convention in Washington, D.C., on Saturday, recently sold 50 to the University of Southern California School of Dentistry, which plans to use it to train future dentists and hygienists.

At $1,000, the dictionary-sized base unit comes relatively cheap for medical equipment, but it will cost dentists more in time.

"This is where the company's making the money," said McGeehan, holding up a disposable needle holder that will cost dentists $1 apiece. "It's like giving Gillette a reason to sell razor blades."

PREGNANT women."

O'Toole said she agrees, and would look to other states for a better example.

Middlesex County homicide investigator Lisa Butner, 36, said her obstetrician told her she could continue her investigative duties, but the state police physician overruled that recommendation. Butner said she rejected the restricted status, and then was ordered onto "no duty" status and told to return to work after her pregnancy.

"They kept telling me I would be forced out of work and would have to use my sick time," Butner said. "And I kept saying, 'I'm not sick.'"

The California Highway Patrol relies on the opinion of a trooper's personal doctor to decide when her pregnancy would hinder her patrol work, spokesman Sgt. Kelly Young said. Like Massachusetts, California has a list of difficult physical tasks troopers must be able to perform, including pulling a 200-pound person from a car and wrestling down a suspect after a 100-yard dash.

But Young said the policy has worked well.

The highway patrol never runs into an issue with this because most of these women get off the road at an appropriate time, Young said.

"They know their body better than anybody," he said.

In Washington state, pregnant troopers are given the option of working behind a desk or continuing to patrol until they don't feel up to it, human resources assistant Chris Ristine said.

Massachusetts state police Capt. Robert Bird said the list of physical requirements — developed by consultants — was approved by the EEOC.

State police legal counsel Eleanor Sinnott defended the task list as a way of deciding whether an investigator can keep working.

"The complaining officers want to be able to work as long as they deem fit," she said. "The department's interest is in public safety."

Hurricane Pauline leaves Acapulco dry; relief efforts fail to quench city's thirst

ASSOCIATED PRESS

ACAPULCO, Mexico — Standing in huge, snaking lines along Acapulco's sweltering, dust-caked streets, thousands of people pleaded Thursday for one of life's most basic necessities: Water.

The shortage of clean water has become critical since Hurricane Pauline tore through southern Mexico last week, killing at least 230 people. Officials are trucking in tens of thousands of gallons a day, but it is not enough to quench the thirst of an increasingly desperate population of 1.5 million.

In Mexico City, Tourism Secretary Silvia Hernandez launched a campaign Thursday to counter internationally broadcast footage of Pauline's destruction by assuring tourists that the damage was confined to hillside communities ravaged by floods.

"The hotels are clean and operating, and the beaches in front of the hotels are also clean," Hernandez said, adding that minor damage to the areas frequented by tourists had been repaired.

But despite Hernandez's efforts to woo tourists, guests at some hotels spoke of water rationing and partially full swimming pools, among other abnormalities.

Thousands of people lined up to pick up half-liter bottles of water at a distribution center in the Parque las Lajas neighborhood Thursday. Some came as early as 3 a.m. To prevent unrest, a soldier with an automatic rifle stood guard at the front of the line.

"It's not enough for my whole family. I need more. I have three little children and they don't have enough to drink," Paula Tomatzin, resident, begged.

It didn't work. Tomatzin walked away, head hanging low.

The relief center's director, Juan Jose Alarcon, said it was tough to turn people away, but many hadn't gotten any water yet. He was supposed to stop handing out water at 5:30 every afternoon, but he kept the center open an extra couple of hours Wednesday because the lines were still long. Even then, he had to say no to some people.

"Shamefully, most of Acapulco is without water," he said. "There is a great need."

The deadly flash floods unleashed by Hurricane Pauline on Oct. 9 mangled water pipes throughout the city and heavily damaged the two main aqueducts that carry river water to Acapulco's water purification plants.

The smaller of the aqueducts was repaired Wednesday, and by Thursday 30 percent of city residents had running water for at least part of the day, said Eleno Garcia Benavente, an official with the National Water Commission.

A mobile filtration plant donated by Palm Desert, Calif.-based U.S. Filter, began producing 5 million liters a day on Wednesday night, filling tanker trucks.

Crews delivered an extra 1.3 million gallons a day in bottles and tanker trucks. But in many neighborhoods, there simply wasn't any.

On the banks of the fetid Camarones River, people dug holes in the mud, let the sediment sink and scooped up liquid from the top. Some were drinking it.

"It isn't good to drink, but we're thirsty," said Selene Toribio Abellanera, 21. "We adults can handle it, but children aren't as strong and we have to look for bottled water for them."

Already, waterborne diseases have begun to appear. Officials said Thursday that Acapulco had eight confirmed cases of cholera, a bacterial infection that causes diarrhea, dehydration and sometimes death. Doctors warned of a possible epidemic.

CLINTON

Trie — because of concerns the money came from foreign or other improper sources.

Chung got a hug from the president when he visited the White House in March 1995 with six Chinese officials in tow to see Clinton's weekly radio address. Chung has said the meeting occurred after he handed a $50,000 check to first lady Hillary Rodham Clinton's then-chief of staff in the White House.

The tapes show James Riady, a wealthy business executive from Indonesia whose family has made big contributions to the Democrats, chatting with Clinton in the White House after a radio address in September 1994. The camera person stopped recording at that point, however, and their conversation wasn't caught on tape.

The tapes viewed by reporters did not show Clinton making explicit appeals for money at events inside or outside the White House. Senate investigators had been hoping that the tapes would reveal whether Clinton did just that.

White House special counsel Lanny Davis, who moderated the presentation to reporters, said, "These events, including those at the White House, confirm what we have always said, that these events were legal and proper."

In all, the White House released 66 video tapes and 121 audio tapes, mostly of the same events caught on camera.

The tapes also were turned over to the Justice Department, where Attorney General Janet Reno said Thursday they are "part of an overall investigation, an investigation that includes those tapes and much, much more."

"If any of the tapes become a part of the decision process, I would review them personally," Reno told her weekly news conference.

The tapes were being viewed as Reno was grilled at a House hearing Wednesday for her handling of the fund-raising probe.

In a sometimes combative session Wednesday before the House Judiciary Committee, she revealed that decisions on closing off areas of investigation would be made both by her and FBI Director Louis Freeh, an unprecedented sharing of her authority.

Today, Reno explained that she and Freeh would both have to approve any decision about strategy, but she alone was responsible for legal decisions and "decisions to invoke the Independent Counsel Act or not."

Republicans said she was caught in a conflict of interest and were adamant that she had no choice but to seek an independent counsel to investigate White House fund-raising activities.

The tapes involved 158 events, 27 of which were at the White House. One unidentified White House dinner guest asked the president's support for an oil pipeline project in the Black Sea. Clinton did not respond.

Many at the events on the tapes were soft-money donors whose contributions to the party can be unlimited in size but cannot be used directly to assist a federal candidate such as Clinton.

He also supported legislation to double the strength of the U.S. Border Patrol and supports a balanced budget amendment.

Gramm will stay in Manhattan to attend the K-State vs. Texas A&M football game on Saturday. Gramm lives in College Station, Texas, has a doctorate in economics and has taught at Texas A&M.

SENATE

In return for their investment, students would receive a guaranteed minimum of 9,000 student seats, frozen ticket prices for four years, reduced-price tickets for two years after graduation and the benefits of the renovated restrooms and concession stands, Urick said.

The second plan calls for a $1 per credit hour fee that will not exceed $24 per student per year. Students would be guaranteed 10,000 season tickets per year. Other benefits of the $1 fee are similar to the 50-cent proposal.

Urick said student money would be used to fund less than one-third of the expansion. The other funds would come from new chair-back seats in the new upper deck, $2.8 million per year from expanded press box seating and parking revenue that would be dedicated to the bond payoff.

> "How sincere is that? Sometimes it depends on how many beers a guy's had when you ask him, but it will be a legitimate stream of revenue."
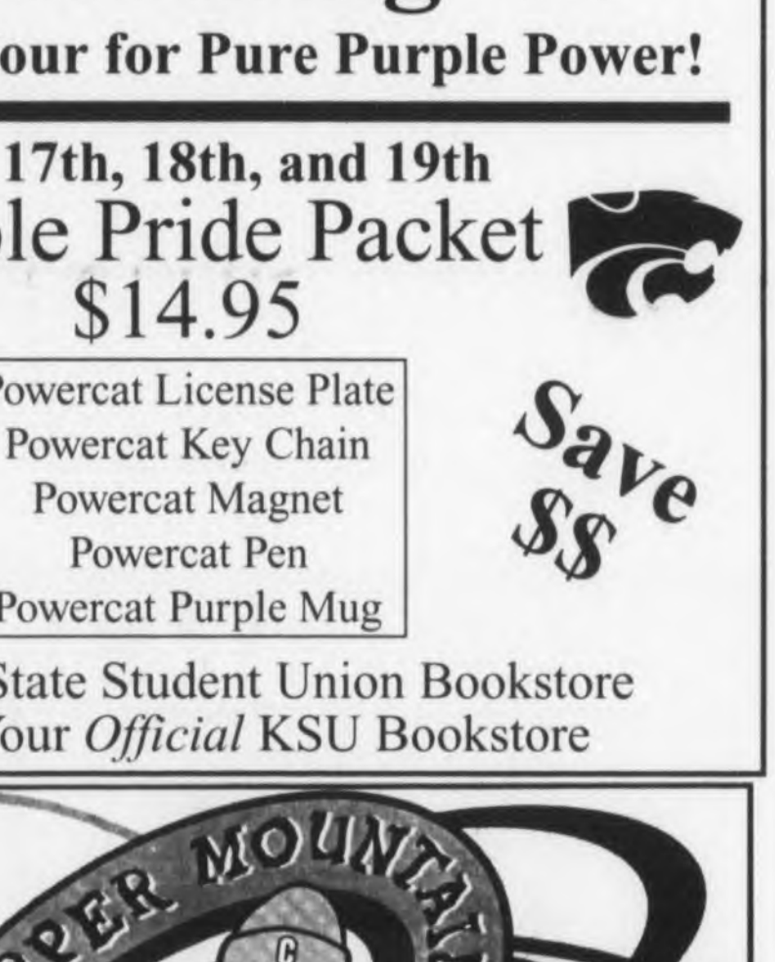
> • Max Urick, athletic director

The waiting lists are long for premium seats, Urick said, which will help the payoff process.

"The suites that we've got in the press box go for around $20,000 per year per suite. We've got a waiting list of 31 now for more suites.

"How sincere is that? Sometimes it depends on how many beers a guy's had when you ask him, but it will be a legitimate stream of revenue," Urick said.



In the end, Urick said, the stadium will expand whether or not students enact a privilege fee.

But without student support, improvements are likely to concentrate on press box and general admission seating, Urick said.

The number of student tickets would not go up.

Senators questioned Urick for more than 30 minutes after his proposal, and later in the meeting heard the first reading of a resolution that calls for the Nov. 11 referendum.

The resolution was referred back to the Privilege Fee Committee and might undergo changes before it comes up for final action.

Cats look for back-to-back wins against Texas A&M

Wildcat-Aggie Showdown

K-State (4-1)
vs.
Texas A&M (5-0)

Saturday, 2:30 p.m.
ABC regional telecast

SUN DEE MILLS
sports editor

The K-State "Aggies" met the Texas A&M Aggies in the early 1900s. In 1912, K-State came away with a 13-10 win in College Station, followed by a 12-0 win in Manhattan in 1913.

This is one time the Wildcats want history to repeat itself.

"I think they're coming in with a chip on their shoulder," junior tight end Justin Swift said, referring to the Cats' 23-20 victory at Kyle Field last season. "They were at home, and their home record is phenomenal. By their standards, they thought they got robbed."

The Aggies' home record of 40-4-1 is the fourth-best home record of any Division I-A team in the 1990s.

But guess who's at No. 5?

"Well, it's better than being 50th, I guess," Coach Bill Snyder said. "It's certainly beneficial to be at home. Our players respond to playing at home. They understand what the record is over a period of years, so I'm sure that there's something there that's an emotional lift."

The infamous "Wrecking Crew" defense will give the Aggies a lift this weekend against the Cats.

A Butkus Award candidate, linebacker Dat Nguyen tallied 11 stops against Colorado Oct. 4 and ABC named him Player of the Game. He has led the Aggies in tackles the past two seasons and was second in the Big 12 with 146.

"Nguyen does some things on instinct you might not want a player to do," Snyder said. "But he has the good athletic ability to make up for that."

The Cat defense is No. 2 in total defense and No. 4 in scoring defense, an extremely competitive position to have next to the Aggies. The Cats have allowed 94 points this season, 56 of them at Nebraska.

Swift said the fact that the two defenses are so similar is useful in the long run.

"It helps us because we get to get used to that type of speed in practice," Swift said. "It is the same type of speed we'll see in the game."

Offensively, Snyder said the Aggies will demonstrate an even split of passing and running.

"They have a very balanced offense," he said. "They are very effective with their passing attack, and they have great running backs."

A&M works within a dual quarterback system. Branndon Stewart and Randy McCown share time at the position, and Snyder said this assists with their passing accuracy.

"There's probably a 10 percent difference in terms of completion percentage between the two," he said. "This leads them to throwing the ball more effectively. McCown might be more mobile."

McCown is second in the Big 12 in passing efficiency with a 150.6 rating, and Stewart is fourth with a 128.8. Sandwiched between the two is Cat quarterback Michael Bishop, with a 139.6 rating.

The running game is spearheaded by Dante Hall and Sirr Parker, and both players participate on special teams. Parker has returned back-to-back kickoffs for touchdowns, and Hall returned a punt for a touchdown against Southwestern Louisiana Sept. 20.

"They are very talented players with great speed," Snyder said. "Not that they didn't have those guys last year, but they just have more continuity now."

But Cat linebacker Jeff Kelly said the team practices against A&M's rushing attack every day — in the form of the Wildcat offense.

"We have fast guys on our team, also," Kelly said.

"Making tackles will be the key to this game."

Aggie Coach R.C. Slocum agreed with his players in his media conference Tuesday, saying K-State is the most talented team the Aggies have faced to date.

"I don't have any question that they're the best team we've played so far," Slocum said. "They're well-coached, and they play hard. They're a real solid football team."

In just a few weeks, field goals will take on a whole new meaning.

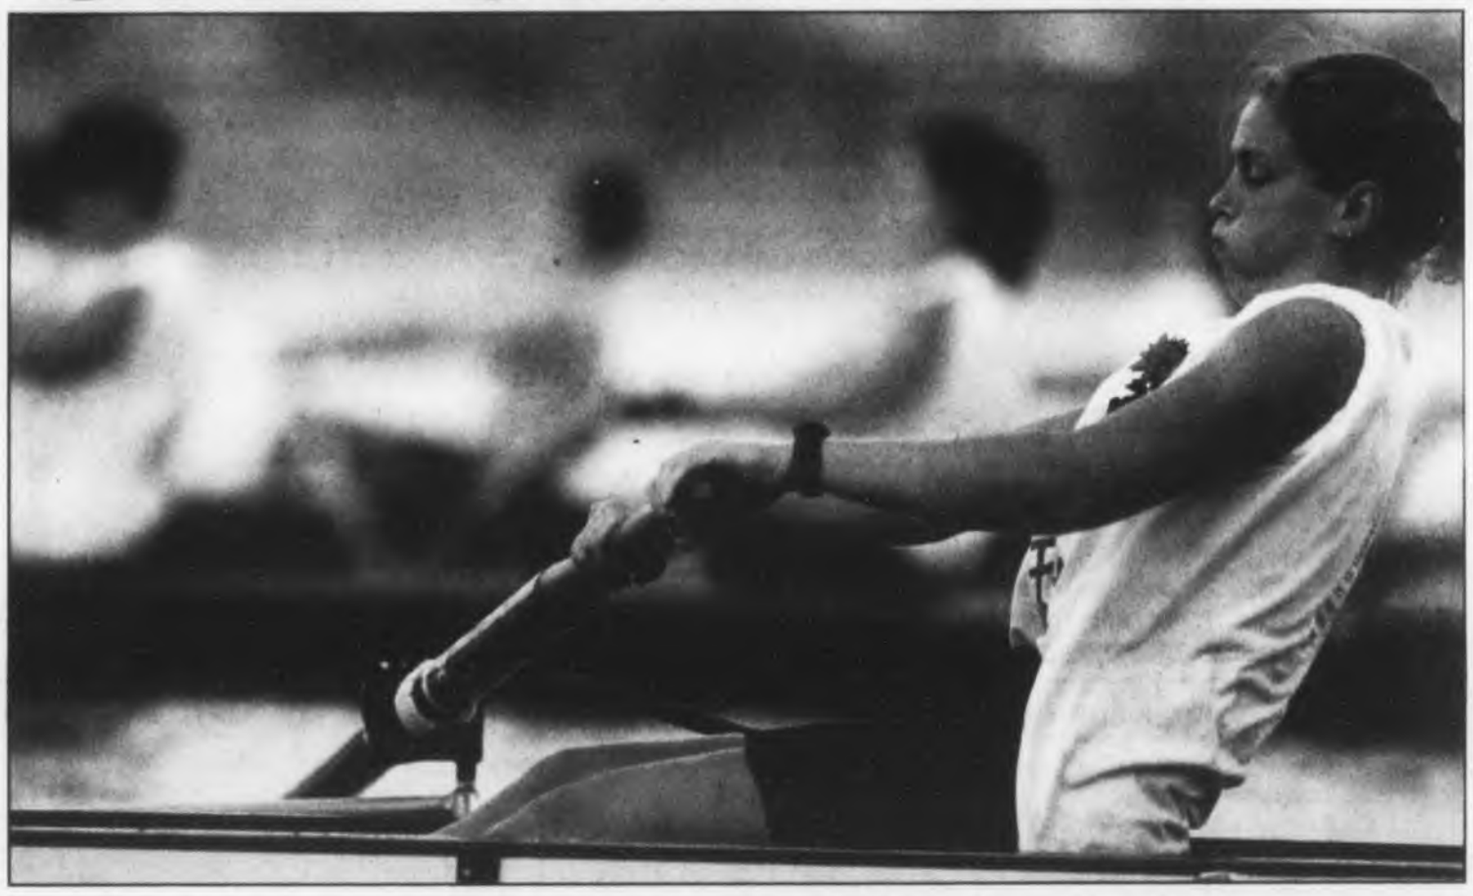
On Oct. 30, Wildcat fans will get their first opportunity to see the 1997 men's and women's basketball teams along with ESPN/ABC college basketball analyst Dick Vitale.

For fans who can't wait for the season to get started, the annual basketball campout for ICAT and general admission tickets begins Monday.

The campout, which will be located on the east lawn next to Ahearn Field House, has been a tradition for the past 35 years. The two-day event will feature appearances by the two teams, pizza, doughnuts and T-shirt giveaways. It will culminate with the drawing for ICAT and general admission tickets.

David Molamphy, ICAT special events director and sophomore in architectural engineering, said the athletic ticket office will be scanning student IDs this year.

"This is just to ensure that the students get student tickets," Molamphy said.



The event will be co-sponsored by ICAT and the Student Athletic Ticket Committee. Molamphy said about 2000 people have preordered the combination ticket package from the athletic ticket office, and only 1000 tickets will be allotted for ICAT and general admission preferred student seating.

"We only have 500 general admission and 500 ICAT designated seats, where you can sit with other people you know, like at the football games," Molamphy said. "We should have more people camping out than we have spots."

For students who want to camp out, a registration packet is available at the Student Governing Association office. The registration material must be turned in at the SGA office by 5 p.m. today.

If students don't want to camp out but do want ICAT seating, they must pick up their tickets by 3 p.m. on Tuesday.

Crew co-captain leads team with hard work, dedication on water

MICHAEL RYAN
staff writer

The U.S. Army prides itself on getting more done by 9 a.m. than most people do all day.

However, the words "most people" do not include Amanda Kiefer and the K-State women's rowing team.

Kiefer, a junior co-captain, said the rowing team practices every day, Monday through Friday and sometimes on Saturday, from 6 - 8 a.m.

"It's not easy to get up that early and work that hard," Kiefer said.

With the early morning practices, going to class, lifting weights, studying and having a boyfriend in Kansas City, it doesn't leave much freetime, she said.

"Last year was my first year at K-State and this year was the first time I've been to Aggieville. There's a time for studying, there's a time for practice and there's a time for having fun. You have to find a way to balance it all," Kiefer said.

Kiefer, who is still undecided on her major, said the long days don't get in the way of her grades.

"Coach is very adamant that studies come first," she said.

Studying how to row is something else Kiefer had to do.

She joined the rowing team after she saw a boat on campus and she took a flier from one of the coaches. After going to a meeting and practice, Kiefer has been rowing ever since.

"Being part of the team is the most important thing to me," she said.

Being a part of the team has been very beneficial to Kiefer.

When she joined the squad, she didn't know anyone. Now her best friends are her fellow rowers.

She said being on the rowing team has also been educational.

"I've never worked harder in my life," Kiefer said referring to her workout on an ergometer.

An ergometer is a rowing machine that simulates a race. Kiefer said the team practices on the machine for extended amounts of time and it is very difficult.

"I've learned to count on myself and I've learned how to get things done," she said.

Not only has she learned to count on herself, she has also learned to count on her teammates.

Kiefer said Coach Jenny Hale is always stressing the concept of team and teamwork.

"Everybody leads, that's one of the mottos of the team," Hale said. "That's the way rowing works. Everybody has one-ninth of the responsibility."

Kiefer agreed.

"You can be an incredible rower but you're not going to get anywhere by yourself," Kiefer said.

"IT'S NOT THAT EASY TO GET UP THAT EARLY AND WORK THAT HARD."

A&M fans deserve warm welcome after giving Cats royal treatment

VIEWPOINT

DAN MERKER

DAN MERKER is a senior in computer science. You can send your e-mail comments to Dan at dmerker@ksu.edu.

Saturday, when the Texas A&M Aggies come into town, they will miss an important part of their team — most of their fans.

The Aggies have the fourth-best home record this decade (K-State is fifth), having lost only four home contests while tying once. One of those losses came last year at the hands of the Wildcats. The Cats dominated the game until two late scores by A&M gave the Aggies a chance to win, but Chris Canty forced a fumble in the final minute to ensure the victory.

Despite handing Texas A&M a rare home loss, the Aggies' fans were civil in defeat.

"I don't think they were hostile at all," Coach Bill Snyder said. "They were a good crowd, really supportive of their team, and they did some things to get them back in the ball game."

The fans at Kyle Field perfectly mixed enthusiasm, volume and class. Southern hospitality usually doesn't translate to the not-so-friendly environment of a football stadium, but in College Station, K-State fans were still welcomed with open arms.

That's how it should be. Fans should be able to go to road games and be enthusiastic without fearing for their lives. All hostility should be played out on the field instead of in the stands. Whether the home team wins or loses, the road team's fans should be treated well. They're bringing money into the university and the town, and the enthusiasm they bring — regardless of who it is for — is wonderful for the sport.

I personally appreciate the efforts of the people who travel to support their team. When I went to Lincoln, Neb., on Oct. 4, K-State fans were treated wonderfully, at least from what I saw. That might have been different had the Cornhuskers lost, but the fact is, going to Lincoln was an enjoyable experience for me despite the Wildcat slaughter.

This weekend, it's time for us to return the favor to those good Aggie fans. We should roll out the purple carpet for them, partially to thank them for their good treatment last year, and partially because it's the right thing to do.

K-State has class. We should show it to everyone. Our alumni coming in for Homecoming should be proud to say that they are K-State graduates. Showing respect to incoming fans, be they alumni or Aggie fans, will show the true colors of K-State.

We should also show that we can be as good as the Aggies in terms of cheering and atmosphere. "When it

Wildcats head to Iowa State minus 2 key starters

SAM FELSENFELD
staff writer

Last weekend, the K-State volleyball team finally picked up some needed momentum.

After losing three of their first four Big 12 Conference matches, the Wildcats won both of their matches, improving to 3-3 in conference play, and 11-6 overall.

Shepherd

However, the Cats lost two starters this week, and will need two sophomores to step up when they travel to Iowa State tonight and to Missouri on Saturday.

Junior hitter Alexis Shepherd will not travel with the team this weekend. She was suspended indefinitely by K-State coach Jim McLaughlin for violating an unspecified team policy.

"It wasn't a major thing. It's just a little thing that all Cats have to take care of. That's what we told her. She'll be all right. She's doing better and she should be back soon," McLaughlin said.

McLaughlin noted the situation with Shepherd was one he has had to deal with in the past. "You could call it Cat policy. It was just kind of a team thing," McLaughlin said. "It's something I've had to deal with on every team I've been a part of. It's nothing new. Sometimes they learn it early in the season, sometimes they learn it later. But it's always better if they learn it earlier."

Junior middle blocker Val Wieck will hit from Shepherd's right side and sophomore Heather Lindell will start in the middle. Lindell has played sparingly this season, appearing in four of K-State's 61 games.

Ryning

Lindell, at 6-feet-3 inches, is K-State's tallest player and will probably upgrade the Cats' blocking.

Senior setter Devon Ryning will probably not start for the Cats tonight. Ryning had a wisdom tooth pulled and missed the last two practices this week. McLaughlin said she is recovering well, but he lists her as tentative for tonight's match against the Cyclones.

However, Ryning is probable for Saturday's match against the Tigers.

Replacing Ryning in the starting lineup will be sophomore Linsey Luther, who has appeared in 33 games this season.

"We'll be all right," McLaughlin said. "We just have to take care of the ball. We had a couple good practices with the new lineup and we just have to be ready to compete and play steady this weekend in both matches."

Still, Ryning could play for the Cats in both matches.

"She's tough as nails," McLaughlin said. "She's tough. What's always made Devon better than everybody is emotionally, she's a tough girl. She's tough. She's strong."

Either way, though, K-State will be ready to play Iowa State.

"I think the people who are coming in have done a great job coming in and stepping up," junior swing hitter Kim Zschau said. "We've just got to take it one play at a time and go from there."

The Cats prepared for Iowa State and Missouri by spending the week in practice working on adjusting to the new starters and improving its offense, Zschau said.

McLaughlin said the Cats practiced well, and should be able to carry the momentum they gained in their matches last weekend into tonight's meeting with the Cyclones.

"We've got to be prepared and expect a challenge this weekend, and accept the challenge and go after it," he said. "I think the girls are prepared. They're in a good frame of mind right now, and they're ready to have a good road trip."

Cross country coach hopes team can rebound after sub-par races

JOEL WHITE
staff writer

In this Saturday's Iowa State Memorial Cross Country Classic, K-State cross country coach Randy Cole said he hopes his team can make amends for its mediocre finish in Oklahoma State's Cowboy Jamboree.

K-State's women placed fifth and the men placed seventh in the 12-team field of the Cowboy Jamboree. Cole said he thought both teams could have placed higher.

"We lost points in the last meet because people passed us down the home stretch," Cole said.

Stressing a team concept in cross country running, Cole said his team needs to run better as a pack to prevent being passed on the home-stretch.

"If they're within 10 seconds of each other, there is no reason why we can't be together," Cole said.

K-State's top women's runner, freshman Annie Wetterhus, said the team will be able to remedy the problem.

"We've been working more on faster-paced stuff," she said. "We need to be stronger mentally, and not let anyone pass us at the end of the race."

Cole said the Memorial Cross Country Classic is important because it will be a tune-up for the Big 12 Championships on Nov. 1. It will also be a preview of the course for the Midwest Regional, which will be later in the season.

The meet will feature 15 teams on the men's and women's sides.

Nationally ranked Iowa State will be the favorite to win the men's competition, while Minnesota will be the favorite in the women's race.

"Iowa State is pretty much the team that we're concerned with right now," said Brandon Jessop, the Wildcat's top runner.

The Wildcats faced Iowa State at the Roy Griak Invitational, where they placed four runners ahead of Jessop. Jessop's fastest time of the season at 8,000 meters, 25:32, was in the Roy Griak Invitational.

In that race, Jessop fell behind the lead pack, and was forced to play catch-up.

This time, he said he is going to be part of the lead pack.

"I'm going to try to go out with the pack and if I die, I die," Jessop said. "The main thing for this meet is not placing or time, but it's running with the guys past my potential," he said.

Wetterhus said she will use this meet as a measuring stick for her competition in the Midwest Regional.

"I'm thinking about the girls from Minnesota and Iowa State, who will be key to the Regional," she said.

Cole said he had confidence in both Jessop and Wetterhus being able to run with, or even pass, the lead pack in the Memorial Cross Country Classic.

"In this field, they ought to be in the top 10," he said.

was crunch time, their fans stepped up by making so much noise it interfered with our audibles and our substitutions," cornerback Joe Gordon said of last year's game.

It shouldn't take the defensive backs raising their arms or the players on the bench waving towels to get the crowd into the game when necessary. We should all know by now when we need to be especially loud, and the effort should be led by the student section.

I hope Aggie fans go back to College Station with the same stories of how great K-State fans are as I have heard about the game at A&M a year ago, both loud and polite.

After all, the Aggies should feel welcome in Aggieville.

It's a zoot suit riot with the Cherry Poppin' Daddies

STORY BY PHIL KELLUM

Music Review

If the members of the Cherry Poppin' Daddies had their way, everyone would be doing the Lindy Hop and jitterbug instead of moshing.

These seven guys from Eugene, Ore., play swing, ska, funk, punk and power pop, too.

On their newest venture, "Zoot Suit Riot" from Mojo Records, they have compiled all their swing tunes onto one disc with four brand-new swing numbers.

The members of the Daddies are not your typical new swing band, like Royal Crown Revue or Big Bad Voodoo Daddy.

Vocalist Steve Perry said in a press release, "We unapologetically play ska right in the face of people who want to hear swing, and we play third-wave ska. The thing that makes us different is we play sort of a third-wave swing. Except there's never been a swing wave, ever."

Their mix of traditional swing arrangements with a definite punk-rock energy and attitude sets them apart from any other band playing swing music.

The album starts off with the title track, which is one of the new songs on the album.

It's about the Zoot Suit Riots that took place in Los Angeles in 1943 and is a smooth, fast song to get you out of your seat and dancing immediately.

The second song is one of my all-time favorite Cherry Poppin' Daddies songs. "Ding Dong Daddy of the D-Car Line" has so much energy and swings so hard, it's unbelievable. This song rocks my world and is definitely one of the top songs on this CD.

Another new song, "When I Change Your Mind," features an almost ragtime/hot jazz arrangement. It reminded me a bit of a Squirrel Nut Zippers track.

The punk-rock energy is most evident on "Here Comes The Snake" with its dark vibe and very hard sound.

One of the other highlights on the album is "Come Back To Me," which is the closest the Daddies come to the pure, old school swing and big band styles.

It features a monstrous, 12-person horn section. Three of the horn players are members of the band, and nine are a group called The First Church of Sinatra.

The horns stand out on the entire album, but on this song they are really out there.

"Dr. Bones" features a bit of the ska that the Daddies are famous for in the guitar riffs. Perry's distinctive, slightly nasal vocals work well on this song, complementing the horns and guitar.

The song "Master And Slave" is a fast song with a killer bass line propelling it along. Its lyrics are a sharp critique of America's social system with various references to religion, Little Jack Horner and Julius Caesar.

The horns on this track just scream in your face.

Perry's lyrics are very observational and thought-provoking, especially on "Drunk Daddy." It's a serious song about child abuse that will make you think while you're dancing.

I had to shudder when I heard Perry exclaim at the end of the song, "OK Dad, you can beat me, but you'll never beat me."

"No Mercy For Swine" is more of a jump blues song that reminds me a lot of the Brian Setzer Orchestra. The guitar solo is even similar to something that Brian Setzer would do.

I love it when bands have their own theme songs, and this band has one, too.

"Cherry Poppin' Daddy Strut" starts off sounding a bit like some old striptease song, then slams into the choruses with its punk-rock guitar riffs and big, brash horns.

Perry resurrects the spirit of Cab Calloway for the last song, "Shake Your Lovemaker," when he scats during the last half of the song.

This is one fine album that deserves to be listened to in this day and age of boring, sterile music.

So kick back, put on your best zoot suit, fix a drink, grab your best dancing partner and pop in this CD.

The members of the Cherry Poppin' Daddies are some swinging cats.

Second release positions band at top of ska music

Music Review

Unlike many bands claiming to play ska nowadays, The Slackers have one collective foot planted firmly in the '60s and the other in the '90s.

The band's debut album, "Better Late Than Never," placed it near the top of the mountain of ska music, and its new album, "Redlight," secures that footing.

This is the first release on Hellcat Records, the new ska and punk record label started by Tim Armstrong of Rancid.

When you pop this compact disc in your CD player, you know there's no fooling around. This is ska music at its best.

▶ The Slackers will be playing 6 p.m. Sunday at the Bottleneck in Lawrence. The price is $8 at the door, and all ages will be admitted.

These bad boys from New York kick their album off with a fitting tribute to legendary Skatalites tenor saxophonist and co-founder of ska music, Tommy McCook. "Cooking For Tommy" is an instrumental number that sounds very much like The Skatalites.

The second track, "Watch This," sounds like it came straight out of 1960s Jamaica and Studio One. Its rock-steady rhythm and sound is reminiscent of The Upsetters. "Watch This" also showcases The Slackers' wonderful vocal harmonies between keyboardist/vocalist Vic Ruggiero and vocalist Marq "Q-Maxx 420" Lyn.

▶ Want to hear an example of their music? Go to the eCollegian at collegian.ksu.edu

The Slackers maintain a very rootsy, traditional ska sound but the band isn't afraid to mix in other styles of 1960s music, like in "Married Girl."

It is a gorgeous mix of ska and 1960s pop music, much like if Phil Spector produced a ska band.

Ruggiero's vocals shine on this song, with him bitterly crooning about seducing a married woman and getting rid of her husband.

Its castanets add a slight Latin feel, which is a nice touch.

"I Still Love You" continues in the Skatalites-ish vein with a beautiful love song that would be perfect for slow dancing with your significant other.

The solos by the horn section on this song flow so smoothly, especially trumpet player Jeremy Mushlin's solo.

The fifth tune, "Soldier," really surprised me. It wasn't a surprise musically, but lyrically.

It's a very serious, dark song about police brutality. It's a very important topic that is never touched on in ska music.

The lyric that really stood out for me was a line about the jockish mentality of some police officers, "Just one kick and say good night. Your boots so long. Your legs so strong. Singing your football victory song."

The title track is a very smooth song about breaking up with your girlfriend and features a duet between Ruggiero and Lyn.

The members of the Slackers also aren't afraid to cover songs by legends.

The band tackles "Tin Tin Deo" by Dizzy Gillespie and Chano Pozo and transform it into a dub-influenced reggae tune featuring Jamaican percussionist Larry McDonald.

"She Wants To Be Alone," yet another sad love song, marks Mushlin's debut as a songwriter and vocalist for the band.

When I heard him sing over and over again, "It hurts to be alone," I knew exactly what he meant.

The trombone solos by Clark Gayton added a lot to the song without showboating.

With its almost gospel-sounding intro, "Rude And Reckless" blew me away.

It features Ruggiero and guest vocalist Paul Parkins recounting advice given by Ruggiero's father and his answers.

Its organ-driven rhythm is addictive and catchy.

The closing song on the CD was unexpected.

"Come Back Baby" is an acoustic reggae tune with a bossa nova influence. I love it because it's very catchy and has a very sparse arrangement.

It is such a wonderful way to close the album.

"Redlight" is a perfect addition to anyone's record collection.

And for those who want to check out The Slackers live, the band will be playing Sunday at The Bottleneck in Lawrence. The Adjusters, from Chicago; Venice Shoreline Chris; and local boys The Norman 360 will open the show. It starts at 6 p.m., is for all ages and tickets are $8 at the door.

This is the third time The Slackers has been scheduled to play the area, and it's the first time its been able to appear. Don't miss this show. It's going to be an incredible gig.

Horror film turns quality script, plot twists into successful release

Movie Review

"I Know What You Did Last Summer" is a classic summer horror movie that happens to come out in October.

Set in an anonymous seaside town on the East Coast, four high school seniors are out celebrating the end of summer, young love and their friend's beauty pageant win, when they hit a person while on the way home from the beach late at night.

Rather than go to the cops, they decide to toss the corpse into the drink, swear eternal silence and go on with their lives. Were that all hit-and-runs cleaned up so neatly.

The fact that all this happens in the first 20 minutes of the movie is a pretty good indicator that this plan is not to be. So let the mayhem ensue.

The four teen-agers are lulled into a nice, quiet sense of complacency by having a fairly normal year pursuing their own plans.

Julie, Party Of Five's Jennifer Love Hewitt, goes to college away from home. She was most shaken by the accident and drags her feet home come summertime.

Helen played by Sarah Michelle Gellar, who also stars in "Buffy the Vampire Slayer", had planned to go to New York City and become a famous actress. That didn't work out, and now she's selling perfume in her parents' department store.

The boys, Barry and Ray, have become a brat and a fisher, respectively. Keeping their mouths shut was Barry's (Ryan Phillippe) idea all along. Ray (Freddie Prinze Jr.) is happy to just forget the whole thing.

For the most part they manage to, until Julie gets a letter in the mail with a one-line note inside: "I know what you did last summer," written in black magic marker. Let the mayhem begin.

As with all great horror movies, the characters immediately divide themselves into the freak-out-and-call-the-cops camp and the let's-not-do-anything-and-it-will-go-away camp. We all know the cops in these movies are only there to provide transportation from one site of carnage to the next and this movie is no exception. Doing nothing is what makes them easy pickin's. So they act on a combination of the two, tracking down any witnesses and the dead guy's sister while watching each other's backs all the while.

"I Know What You Did Last Summer" is not a bad movie at all. It's not Hitchcock by any stretch, but no one in hockey masks shows up either.

It was written by Kevin Williamson, who also wrote "Scream," so you know the script is in trustworthy hands.

The fishing town setting gives lots of opportunity for dead bodies to be stored in ice with the fish and sharp, gutting implements are seen throughout.

The fact that the villain wears a black slicker also helps with the menacing atmosphere.

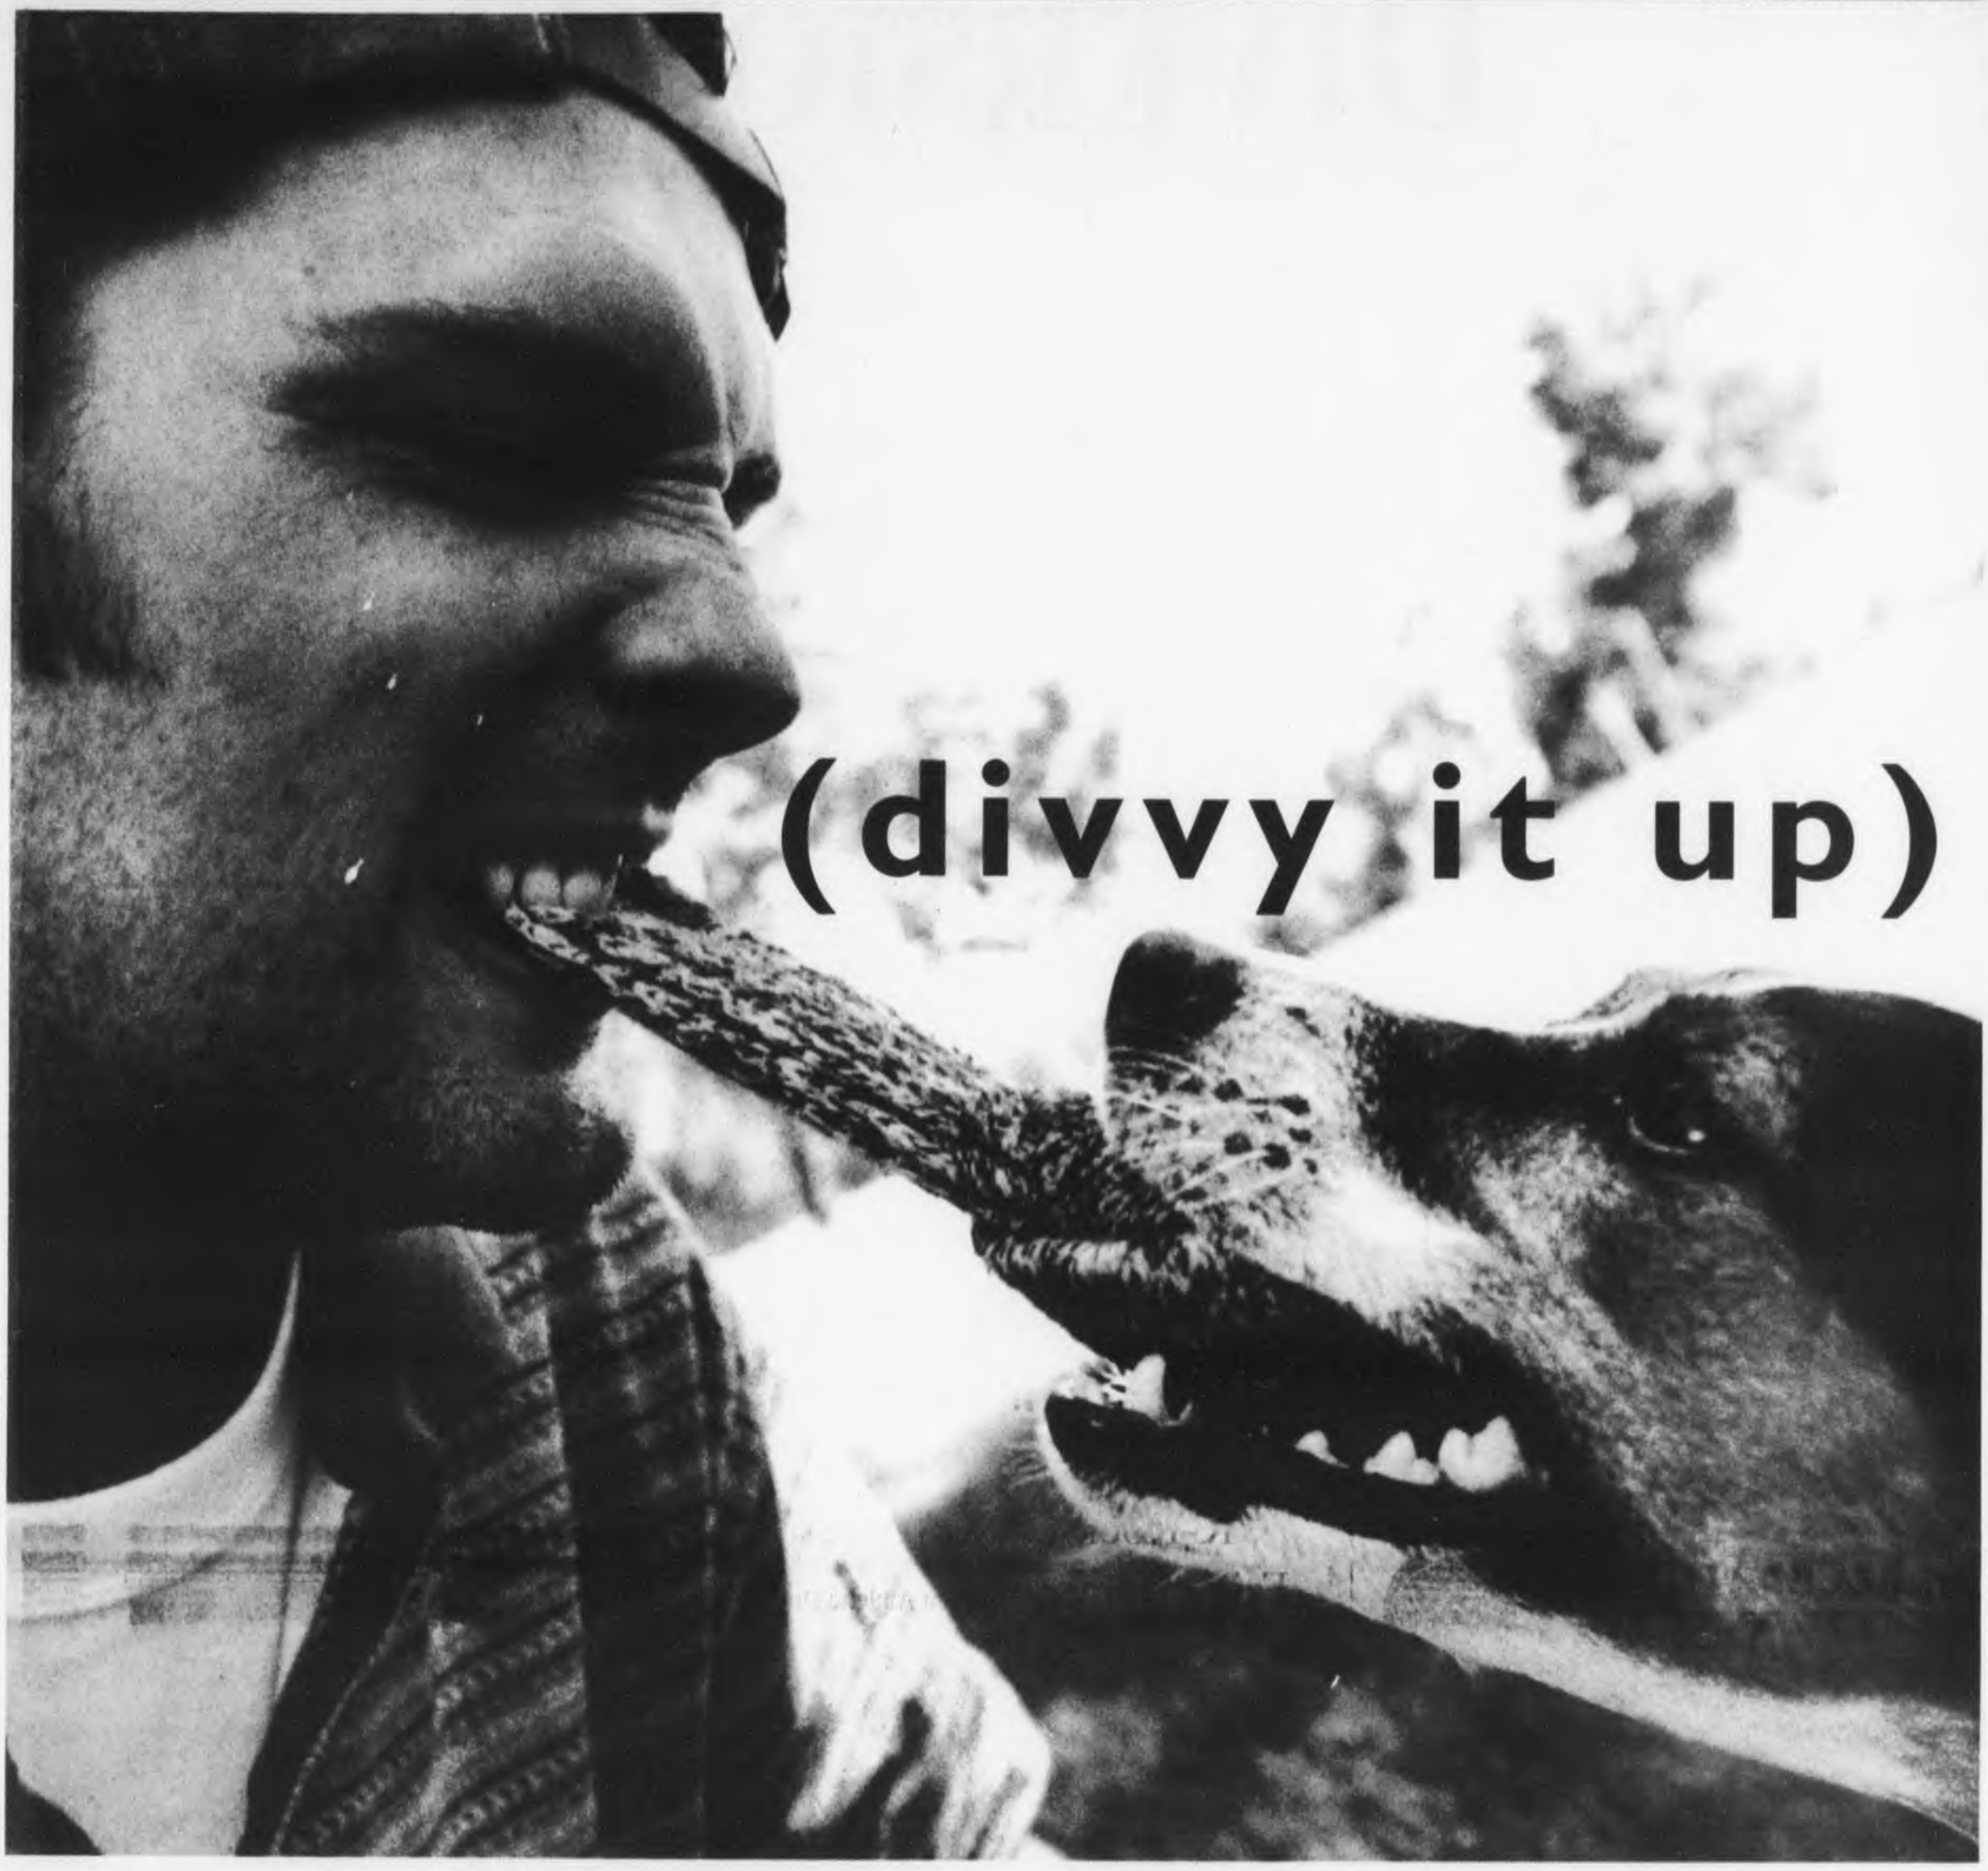
There are a few surprises I won't give away here, and the characters' minds are messed with sufficiently to make it interesting.

The bad guy dies (maybe) and the good guy lives (maybe) to fight another day.

A few things rang false. A couple places seem to hint that the villain has some supernatural ability, but I guess coming back from the dead would give that impression. He also drives a slick black sports car in one scene when the rest of the town drives old pickups.

There was only one line that hit my ear like an anvil. Julie has to look soulfully into the eyes of Ray and say "I feel your pain." However, the potential cheese factor in this flick was high so I give Williamson a couple points for restraint overall. He let one slip. It's his second movie, so I'll forgive the guy.

And yes, this movie is based on the book by the same title, written by Lois Duncan. Also a very creepy read, if you have the time.



So go have some fish and chips and settle back for a fun horror movie. Oh yeah, remember to scream in all the right places.

GTE offers $28 billion in cash for MCI merger

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — MCI Communications Corp., once a scrappy underdog to Ma Bell, is suddenly the hottest merger prospect in business history.

On Wednesday, GTE Corp. offered to buy the nation's second-largest long-distance telephone company for $28 billion. It would be the largest all-cash deal ever, topping the 1989 sale of RJR Nabisco Inc. for $25 billion.

The unsolicited bid intensifies pressure on WorldCom Inc., which offered $30 billion in stock for MCI two weeks ago. British Telecom, which has a 20-percent stake in MCI, had offered $21 billion in stock and cash.

MCI said its board would meet soon to review the GTE and WorldCom bids. Shareholders are scheduled to vote on British Telecom's offer in December.

The offer for MCI is the latest jolt to the nation's telecommunications industry. A federal law intended to force more competition has touched off attempts by the biggest players to buy their way into each other's businesses.

A combined GTE-MCI would be an industry behemoth, with $40 billion in annual revenue, more than 21 million local business and residential customers and 24 million in long-distance lines.

With less than $1 billion cash on hand, GTE would need to borrow billions for the deal. GTE chairman Charles Lee said he would be willing to consider paying a combination of cash and stock instead of all cash.

The bids may seem lavish for MCI, a mobile radio company that grew over three decades into the fiercest challenger to AT&T Corp.'s monopoly on long-distance service.

But with massive regulatory and technological changes in the past two years, MCI is in a position to take advantage of new opportunities, particularly in local service.

The company has spent billions to build local networks of fiber-optic cable to handle calls in more than two dozen cities. Other companies, such as Sprint and AT&T, look to lease lines from local phone companies and then "resell" them to customers.

MCI also is a leader in selling long-distance services to large companies; more than half of its revenue is from big businesses.

That has made MCI attractive to GTE, a hybrid local and long-distance company, and WorldCom, the No. 4 long-distance company. Both want to expand their communications businesses.

By selling a variety of services, big phone companies aim to sell all-in-one packages of local, long distance and other communications services in one contract. By tying customers to packages, phone carriers hope to reduce the number of people who switch companies.

WorldCom's offer would be worth more than the two rival bids, but investors may settle for a lower price for the security of cash over stock. MCI is scrutinizing whether WorldCom's stock would retain its value.

WorldCom said its offer was superior, insisting it and MCI were more compatible.

Unlike Baby Bells that sell service in concentrated regions, GTE offers local service in thousands of communities in 28 states, both in the Midwest and West. Federal law requires the Baby Bells, formed by the court-ordered breakup of AT&T, to show they face competition for local service before offering long-distance services.

"It makes sense for GTE to get into the long-distance market as aggressively and as fast as it can because it's free to do so," said David Goodtree, an industry analyst with Forrester Research.

But AT&T said it would expect federal regulators to force GTE to open up its local markets to more competition before approving a deal.

The merger would have to be approved by antitrust authorities and the Federal Communications Commission, which would determine whether a GTE-MCI combination would stifle or boost competition in the long-distance and local phone markets and examine its likely effect on telephone prices.

GTE announced its bid after the stock market had closed Wednesday. But MCI stock rose $1.56 1/4 on the Nasdaq Stock Market, to close at $36.87 1/2 as rumors circulated. Trading in GTE stock was halted on the New York Stock Exchange as word of the offer leaked out, off $2.18 3/4 at $48.

Newspaper Web site subpoenaed for unpublished reader responses

ASSOCIATED PRESS

VENTURA, Calif. — In what has been described as a legal first, the Ventura County Star was subpoenaed for user information from the newspaper's Internet site about a local murder trial.

The subpoena, which asks for unpublished e-mail and demographics of people who participated in an online survey, explores new territory between legal protections for the media and a defendant's right to a fair trial, said Terry Francke, a media attorney with the California First Amendment Coalition.

"This is very new, and I suspect the courts will be grappling with more and more of these types of requests from attorneys as the medium grows," Francke said Wednesday.

The Internet site detailed the Diana Haun murder trial. Haun was convicted Sept. 28 of conspiracy, kidnapping and murder in the slaying of Sherri Dally, her lover's wife — an act prosecutors said was a human sacrifice birthday present. The penalty phase of Haun's trial is scheduled to begin Monday.

The subpoena was served this week by James Farley, the defense attorney of Haun's lover and alleged co-conspirator Michael Dally. His trial is set to begin Nov. 24. Jurors will be bused to Ventura from adjoining Santa Barbara County.

The Internet site stretches beyond the newspaper's circulation area in Ventura County, possibly contaminating jury pools in Santa Barbara County, said Len Newcomb, an investigator for Farley.

"The media decided to make this a high-profile case and decided they wanted to reach a vast number of people," Newcomb said. "And the worst-case scenario is that we won't be able to find jurors who don't already have strong biases."

Newcomb has filed subpoenas on 56 news organizations, from Los Angeles to San Luis Obispo, requesting unpublished reader, listener and viewer response to the Haun coverage.

The latest subpoena unquestionably invades legally protected discourse between readers and their newspapers, said Timothy J. Gallagher, the Ventura newspaper's editor-in-chief.

"I don't have a problem providing information to defense attorneys that has already appeared in the newspaper, or in this case online, but beyond that there's a privileged relationship between newspapers and readers," Gallagher said.

Putting purple pride to work

K-State Ambassador candidates explain why they want to represent K-State

Mark Barkman
junior in business marketing

K-State Wildcat is a badge I wear proudly. Our prestigious achievements are at the Purple Heart of every student, faculty and staff member throughout Wildcat Country. They are also the drive that makes me want to represent this university throughout the land.

Looking at K-State's future, we see many changes that only strengthen our ability to recruit the brightest and most dedicated students. This year's freshman class has more than 270 students who ranked first or second in their high schools. These freshmen, combined with an overall ranking of No. 1 for state university scholars, display our renowned academic standing.

This is where my representation of K-State will prove valuable. To keep this tradition going and educate potential students, as well as alumni, as to what K-State has to offer, we need an expert on all of the opportunities this campus provides. In working as a reporter at KKSU-AM 580, I have become familiar with many of the campus activities, clubs and services, as well as the accomplishments of the different colleges and the overall campus. This knowledge enables me to give a positive representation of K-State on all levels.

With the pride and respect I have for K-State guiding me, I will use my talents to their fullest extent. I will work hard to make it known to the nation and to the world that K-State is a leader — a leader in academics, a leader in research and a leader into the future.

Jason Heinrich
junior in industrial engineering

Why do I want to be a K-State ambassador? There can only be one answer — Wildcat Pride. Did you know K-State ranks fourth in its number of national scholars? Do you know research being done at K-State suggests that working your muscles might also work your brain? Do you know K-State has sent 131 experiments on NASA space shuttle flights? Do you know K-State has more than 350 clubs and organizations? Do you know K-State's Student Governing Association is ranked No. 1 in the nation?

Wildcat Pride excites me. I want to represent K-State during its perpetual quest to become a preeminent university. I want to be a member of the team that 1. promotes K-State as the university with the best and brightest students; 2. lures the top scholars and leaders to a "best buy" in college education for its affordability, high academic standards and top-notch student body; and 3. spreads the spirit of Wildcat Pride to all people everywhere. It would be a win-win adventure. Not only would it be an awesome growth experience for me, but more importantly, it would be an opportunity for me to proclaim Wildcat Pride throughout the land. People need to know K-State is a reservoir of endless opportunities. People need to know K-State has the finest, hardest working and most determined people anywhere. People need to know that the opportunity to grow in excellence is to be found in the heartland of America, in the Little Apple, in Manhattan, at K-State. As an ambassador, people will know that I believe in Wildcat Pride.

Kelli Ludlum
junior in animal science and industry

Purple Pride is more than just a slogan; it is an unforgettable experience. Established by warmth and friendship, Purple Pride permeates the classroom, the campus activities and the football stadium at K-State. It is a feeling that is instilled in all of us, and it is a loyalty that will remain with us even after graduation as we continue to support our alma mater.

My Purple Pride has grown progressively stronger as I've grown older. Because my Dad is a die-hard K-State alumnus, I grew up seeing, hearing and dreaming about Willie the Wildcat. There was no doubt in my mind about where my degree would come from. Still, I was undeniably impressed when I took an official campus tour as a high school senior. The "people atmosphere" at K-State was incredible. The smiles and enthusiasm displayed by faculty, staff and students alike made me even more excited to enroll at K-State. As a K-State Ambassador, I want to communicate this environment to potential K-State students.

The K-State "family" creates a university that excels in academics, athletics, activities and the arts. The results of our commitment to excellence are unparalleled national achievements that fuel the Purple Pride for students and alumni as well. I would be honored by the opportunity to represent the many students I have met through numerous activities and classes, while sharing our Purple Pride with future Wildcats and alumni.

Mandy Reese
junior in music education

Having lived in Manhattan all of my life, I was born and raised a Wildcat. In the past 10 years, I have seen K-State transform into one of the best public schools in the nation. Our community is busting with Wildcat Pride, and I am no exception.

I believe this enthusiasm and love for K-State are what most qualify me to be a K-State Ambassador. Campus involvements and leadership positions have given me the experience and knowledge to be approachable and informed as a student representative.

There is no doubt that K-State excels in academics, athletics and opportunities:

- K-State is No. 1 in the number of premier scholars among public universities.
- K-State football has made four consecutive bowl appearances.
- K-State has more than 350 campus organizations to get involved in, including a Student Governing Association ranked No. 1 in the nation.

It gives me so much pride to be a part of something this successful. As an ambassador, I plan to share this pride with prospective students to bring K-State the best and brightest. I look forward to working with our outstanding alumni to encourage their continued support.

I have witnessed a transformation at K-State into a top-notch university. With my K-State enthusiasm and pride, we can only continue to get better. It would be an incredible privilege to serve as the next K-State Ambassador.

Sara Reser
junior in marketing

I love K-State. I love Willie the Wildcat, anything purple and "The Wabash Cannonball." I love walking through campus and smiling at people I don't know. I love it when they smile back. I love the moment when our football team runs onto the field and everyone in the student section is going crazy. I love Call Hall ice cream. I love going to McCain Auditorium events, Landon Lectures, bowl games and movies at Forum Hall. I love seeing tour groups walking across campus and the excited looks on all of the prospective students' faces. I remember having that look myself. I love hearing the fight song sounding through campus when the band is practicing at Memorial Stadium.

I simply love this place, and I love to tell people about it.

K-State has so much to brag about. Once referred to as the "Student Scholar Capital of the Nation," we excel academically. We've been named one of the top 100 best buys in the nation. We have many award-winning student organizations on campus, including Student Senate, Greek Affairs and our Student Publications Inc. I could go on for hours about all of K-State's accomplishments, and that's why I want to be an ambassador.

This university has so much to offer everyone, and I can't wait to encourage others to experience it for themselves and love it as much as I do.

CLASSIFIED AD WRITING TIPS

- List items or services first. Always put what item or service you are advertising first. This helps potential buyers find what they are looking for.
- Don't use abbreviations. Many buyers are confused by abbreviations.
- Consider including the price. This tells buyers if they are looking at something in their price range.

Controversial company cancels plans to relocate in KC area

ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — A Topeka company plagued by controversy about its ties to state lawmakers has broken off plans to move to the Kansas City area.

BioCore Inc., a manufacturer of wound-care dressings, planned to move the bulk of its operations to Kansas City, Kan., this year.

BioCore contends buildings it intended to buy from Mallinckrodt Veterinary Inc. had structural problems that Mallinckrodt was unwilling to fix.

Mallinckrodt contends BioCore fell behind on payments and defaulted on its contract.

"Both sides claimed that the other side had defaulted," said BioCore lawyer Jean Paul Bradshaw.

Another tenant now plans to buy the 34 acres. The new tenant is a manufacturer of generic pharmaceutical and personal health products. It will employ 30 to 40 workers.

BioCore talked of employing 100 at the Kansas City, Kan., site and expanding to 300 to 400 employees in a few years.

Late in 1995, BioCore announced plans to build a 60,000-square-foot building in Shawnee, Kan. The company later changed course with its plans to move to Kansas City, Kan.

BioCore has been in the news for much of the year after reports that the company had received a federal subpoena for records detailing ties between BioCore workers and employees of a state economic development agency.

Since 1990, BioCore has received nearly $900,000 in grants, loans and equity investments from state economic-development groups. The company has employed several influential Republican lawmakers, including the speaker of the Kansas House, Tim Shallenburger.

Kansas Attorney General Carla Stovall announced March 14 that the state Bureau of Investigation was scrutinizing the company. A spokeswoman for Stovall said Wednesday the investigation was continuing.

BioCore officials have denied wrongdoing, and no charges have been filed.

7 states sue to halt Herbal Ecstacy sales

ASSOCIATED PRESS

PHOENIX — Seven states have filed lawsuits to end the sale of Herbal Ecstacy, a product its maker says is a dietary supplement and not an illegal drug like the well-known Ecstasy.

The suits filed Wednesday contend Herbal Ecstacy, made by Global World Media Corp. of Venice Beach, Calif., is illegal because it has not been approved as a drug by the Food and Drug Administration.

Sean Shayan, president and founder of Global, said no injuries or deaths have been linked to the pills he described as diet helpers. He acknowledged focusing on youths as customers.

"It's the youth out there who are actually buying the real drugs," he said. "So what's wrong with purchasing a safe alternative?"

Herbal Ecstacy and similar brands were banned in Florida after the 1996 death of a 20-year-old New York student on spring break who took a similar product, Ultimate Xphoria.

Both contain ephedrine, found in the Asian ephedra, or ma huang, plant. The FDA classifies it as a dietary supplement.

Makers of products sold as alternatives to street drugs say ephedrine produces euphoria and increased sexual awareness.

But the FDA has linked ephedrine-laced dietary supplements to at least 17 deaths and 800 illnesses, including nerve damage, strokes and heart attacks.

Besides calling Herbal Ecstacy an illegal drug, the lawsuits allege that Global used deceptive trade practices and false advertising, such as testimonials from a made-up doctor and organization.

The states suing are Arizona, California, Illinois, Minnesota, Pennsylvania, Texas and Wisconsin. The lawsuits seek not only to stop sales of the product but also civil penalties, court costs and refunds for buyers.

Woman killed after gunman fired at stray dog

ASSOCIATED PRESS

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. — A woman was shot to death as she sat near a memorial to homicide victims. Witnesses said the gunman apparently was firing a pistol at a stray dog.

Norma Barrios, 33, was chatting with a co-worker at Pat Hurley Park when she was shot in the chest Tuesday. The shooter was in a parking lot but couldn't see Barrios because the bench and memorial were obscured by a large bush, homicide Detective Rick Foley said.

"There's no way you can see" the bench from the lot, Foley said. Barrios was "just over there talking. She fell there, right in front of the (memorial) rock."

City officials said the memorial will be dedicated Sunday. A city work crew had placed the stone in the park Monday to commemorate homicide victims. It reads: "In loving memory of the innocents who are gone, but never forgotten. Let us remember them by stopping the violence."

Police were investigating but made no immediate arrests.

Albuquerque Police Department spokesman Tony Herrera said Thursday the shooter fired from a vehicle stopped at the park. He said witnesses in a nearby car overheard the man saying "something like, 'Shoot that dog.'"

6 arrested in Aggieville brawl

TRAVIS D. LENKNER/Collegian
RILEY COUNTY POLICE OFFICERS Steve Adams, left, and David Falletti prepare to transport Yvonne Silva to jail for disorderly conduct early Sunday morning. Silva and others were arrested for a disturbance in the 1100 block of Moro.

APRYL MATHES
staff writer

Several Riley County Police officers were attempting to break up a brawl outside Bombers early Sunday morning when one ended up catching it in the rear.

Literally.

"I think he was down, and he got kicked in the ass," Sergeant Joe Stech said. "He was trying to break up a fight."

Officer Dave Etter was not injured in the incident, though.

Michael C. Liebig was arrested for battery to a law enforcement officer and was held on $1,000 bond.

Five other people were either arrested or issued notices to appear for battery or disorderly conduct.

Although the majority were bystanders, there may have been as many as 400 people present, Etter said.

"Some of the officers did have to use their pepper spray to combat the crowds," Etter said.

Stech said the RCPD had taken extra precautions this past weekend.

"Since it was a game weekend, we had four full-time officers in the area at all times, and that is supplemented with patrol officers as well."

The officers had to call in other units after the fight spread out between 11th and 12th streets on Moro, Etter said.

The reason for the fight, Stech said, could be chalked up to the combination of alcohol and crowded conditions.

"People get inside these clubs, and they're hot and sweaty, and they're drinking," he said. "When the clubs close, they're all mashed together trying to get out, and sometimes people start swinging."

Etter agreed.

"People get angry, and they come out in the streets to take care of it," he said.

Committee members author resolution to endorse Anderson Avenue expansion

LANCE SCHOEN
staff reporter

The Governmental Relations Committee authored a resolution endorsing the Anderson Avenue expansion Sunday.

The resolution needs Student Senate approval before it is enacted.

The $7 million project, which will expand Anderson Avenue between Sunset Avenue and 16th Street, is scheduled to begin February 1999 and be completed by the end of October of that year.

The renovations include the addition of a left-turning lane and are intended to reduce accidents and improve traffic flow. New traffic and pedestrian crossing signals will also be added at each intersection.

Nearly $250,000 will be appropriated from the City/University Tax Fund and the remainder will be provided through federal funds and the Kansas Department of Transportation.

Money for the City/University Tax Fund, created when Manhattan annexed the university in 1994, is collected through 1 percent sales tax added to anything purchased on campus.

Money from the fund is spent on projects that potentially benefit students as well as Manhattan residents.

The committee wrestled with the need to even address the expansion project again, but an Oct. 14 Collegian article sparked new controversy, which pushed the committee into action, Patrick Carney, committee chair, said.

Carney said the resolution provided an opportunity to be proactive.

"This can be used as a model of efficiency," Carney said. "It will heighten the awareness."

Committee member Chris Smither agreed with Carney.

"Is this unnecessary or preventative maintenance?" he said. "We might as well put our name on it with how the students feel about it."

Committee member Greg Cleaver was against the resolution.

"I am opposed to deal with it," he said. "I don't think the concern is that great."

▶ Quick facts
According to the Endorsement of Anderson Avenue Expansion Project, more than 1,200 pedestrians cross Anderson Avenue at 17th Street each day. More than 27,000 vehicles use Anderson Avenue daily. Traffic is expected to increase to more than 35,000 in the next few years.

Companies sue Kansas about Hale expansion

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

Hale Library was dedicated Oct. 5, but a lawsuit alleging breach of contract and professional negligence was filed in September against the State of Kansas and the main contractor.

A lawsuit for $500,000 was filed in a Shawnee County District Court by lawyers for Central Mechanical Construction Co. and D.L. Smith Electrical Construction, two subcontractors on the Hale project. The lawsuit names the state, the main contractor Law Company, United States Fidelity and Guaranty and Brent Bowman and Associates Architects.

The Law Company responded to the lawsuit with a $5 million petition suing the state for breach of contract, breach of implied warranty and misrepresentation.

In the lawsuit, Central Mechanical and Smith Electrical blame loss of business to library project delays and design issues.

Phillip Gragson, attorney for the two subcontractors, said the delays were caused by asbestos, lead paint and contaminated soil issues.

Gragson said the extent and nature of the issues involved in the lawsuit will become clear once more documents are made available for the trial.

"The initial design was not sufficient to allow for construction," Gragson said.

Although the state is named in the two lawsuits, that does not necessarily imply the university will be involved directly.

Jennifer Kassebaum, senior assistant university attorney, said while she is not involved in the lawsuit, her office has been in discussion with the Attorney General's office.

"My assumption is the Attorney General's office is taking the lead because it is the state of Kansas rather than the university that is a named party," Kassebaum said.

"We're involved — obviously — because it's on our campus," she said.

Richard Seaton, university attorney, is handling the university's role in the lawsuit. Phone calls to Seaton's home were not answered on Sunday.

The Farrell Library expansion project, which was renamed Hale upon dedication, cost $30 million. It was paid for by students, the state and private donors. Construction began in 1995 and took two years to complete.

PEOPLE POUR OUT FOR HOMECOMING ACTIVITIES

SPIRIT HEATS UP

STORY BY ANGELA BUCCIGROSSI • PHOTO BY BRANDON WHITE

This year's Homecoming ended Saturday with the morning parade and the afternoon football game against Texas A&M University.

The parade was the final activity in a full week of activities and competition.

The Homecoming winners were listed on the JumboTron during halftime of the game. In the greek division, the Delta Delta Delta/Phi Gamma Delta/Sigma Chi team took first place, and for the Residence Hall Division the Strong Complex team — consisting of Boyd, Van Zile and Putnam halls — took first.

Lindsey Roy, Panhellenic Council public relations director, said the week had been a success.

"I thought the changes that were implemented this year went over very well," she said.

The location for the Pant the Chant competition was one change made this year.

This was the first year the event was at Memorial Stadium in conjunction with a pep rally and bonfire.

The event consists of every team singing or chanting a song that expresses their K-State spirit.

"I think everyone thought the atmosphere of having Pant the Chant here at Memorial Stadium was awesome," Roy said.

One of the purposes of the week's activities was to encourage spirit and excitement for the game.

"It's the spirit of competition, but we're all out to do the same thing, and that's to show everyone how much K-State rocks. This week has been spectacular," Brian Long, member of Delta Sigma Phi fraternity, said.

Jami Nelson, Homecoming coordinator, said the week helped boost excitement for the game.

Participants in the week's activities said they also enjoyed the competitions.

"I thought the week was a very big success. This week was a good bonding experience, and a lot of new friends were made. Having fun was never a problem," Paul Franzen, member of Sigma Nu fraternity, said.

The level of participation for the events was strong, Cade Keenan, Interfraternity Council public relations director, said.

"The degree to which the residence halls and all the houses participated was great," he said.

"Everyone worked hard to make events like the community service project be effective," Keenan said.

Alcohol awareness week kicks off today with booth, ribbons

COLE EHMKE
staff reporter

A public service announcement and 46 seconds of silence at the Homecoming football game began National Collegiate Alcohol Awareness Week, today through Friday.

The week is sponsored by K-State's chapter of Greeks Advocating the Mature Management of Alcohol and draws attention to a problem that the group is trying to improve.

It is a chance to make people aware of the effects and dangers of alcohol and to increase its responsible use, Jamie Wassberg, GAMMA president, said.

At halftime of the Homecoming game, Coach Bill Snyder read a narration about 46 college-age people killed in Kansas in 1996 from alcohol-related car accidents. A second of silence for each person was then observed.

Today and Tuesday, GAMMA will have a booth at the Health and Fitness Tour at the K-State Student Union. The booth will have fliers and handouts, including pens, pencils and T-shirts.

Wednesday evening every greek house will display 46 luminaries, which are symbolic of the victims last year, Spence said.

Herb replaces "fen-phen" as leading weight-loss drug

NEW YORK — For years, German doctors have prescribed an herb called St. John's wort to lift sagging spirits. Now millions of Americans have started using it to lift drooping bellies and backsides as well.

St. John's wort has soared in popularity as a weight-loss supplement since two diet drugs were pulled from the market last month.

Half the nearly 250,000 dieters at Nutri/System weight loss centers use the herb, which shows its golden flowers at their brightest around June 24 — St. John the Baptist's birthday.

The sudden rise of St. John's wort, or hypericum, is hard to miss. Health food store shelves are newly lined with Herbal Phen Fuel, Diet Phen and other St. John's wort blends designed to sound like the now-unavailable diet cocktail "fen-phen."

Many doctors now enthusiastically prescribe the herbal remedy.

Officer kills himself after accident

ACTON, Calif. — A Los Angeles policeman shot himself to death as officers arrived to question him about a hit-and-run accident that seriously injured a woman and her 10-month-old daughter.

Authorities tracked a Ford Bronco that was spotted leaving the scene of the accident to Officer Bryce Wicks, a 28-year veteran and an expert in fingerprinting.

Wicks, 54, committed suicide Friday as investigators arrived at the door of his home in rural Acton, about 40 miles northwest of downtown Los Angeles.

About 8 p.m. Thursday, Juanita Mercado, 23, was wheeling 10-month-old Leslie De La Cruz in a stroller across a street in the Sun Valley area about 20 miles northwest of downtown.

The Bronco clipped Mercado, and the stroller became latched to its bumper, authorities said. The vehicle dragged the stroller a block until it became unhitched during a turn, spilling the baby into the street.

The toddler, who suffered second- and third-degree burns on 30 percent of her body, was awaiting plastic surgery.

Mercado suffered a broken leg and collarbone, and she remained in critical condition Saturday.

Officers to pay shareholders in AMC mismanagement case

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The former chairman of AMC Entertainment, his son and two former directors will pay shareholders $1.3 million to end litigation that had accused them of mismanaging the movie-theater company.

Stanley Durwood, chairman of AMC Entertainment, his son Edward, and former directors Paul Vardeman and Charles Egan Jr. also will pay legal fees of about $750,000 to the plaintiffs in the case.

The payments are part of a settlement of two 1993 lawsuits filed in Delaware, one by a shareholder and one by a former executive of AMC, the country's third-largest movie chain.

The settlement was actually agreed to last year but has awaited final court approval until after some stipulations in the settlement were carried out. Delaware Chancery Court Judge Stephen Lamb approved the settlement on Thursday.

Jury acquits man in fatal shooting over loud music, excess partying

PITTSBURGH, Pa. — A man was acquitted of killing a person and shooting another after a four-year dispute over his neighbor's loud music and ceaseless partying.

Dennis Norkiewicz, 47, who claimed the shooting was in self-defense, was found guilty Friday of carrying his .357-caliber revolver without a license, punishable by up to nine months in jail. He was acquitted of homicide, aggravated assault and reckless endangerment.

Robert O'Malley, 45, was wounded in the shooting.

The O'Malleys moved next door to the house Norkiewicz shared with his mother in 1992. O'Malley said he and his wife drank at least a case of beer a day and would drink in their yard and play music almost every day.

Interrupted from taking a nap, authorities said Norkiewicz took his gun and confronted O'Malley at the fence May 19, 1996.

Prosecutor Kenneth Haber said Norkiewicz could have fired into the air or fled indoors when he saw O'Malley and his friend rush toward him. Instead, he shot O'Malley in the stomach and killed Michael O'Connell, 24.

Lecturer endorses entitlements reform

TRAVIS D. LENKER
staff writer

Sen. Phil Gramm, R-Texas, a former economics instructor at Texas A&M University, wasn't just in Manhattan to watch this weekend's Wildcat vs. Aggie football game.

His Landon Lecture Friday afternoon focused on a more serious subject: Social Security and Medicare reform.

The 1996 candidate for the GOP presidential nomination focused the 111th Landon Lecture on his proposal for investment-based entitlement programs. He warned that the current programs, if left unchanged, will lead to economic disaster.

"It's akin to the situation that you might face if you go to a physical," Gramm said. "The doctor looks you over and checks out all vital parts, and calls you in and says, 'I've got some bad news, and I've got some glorious news.

"'The bad news is you've got a debilitating disease that's going to ruin your life. The glorious news is that I can cure it, but to cure it, you're going to have to go on a diet.'"

Gramm said Social Security and Medicare programs rely on the baby-boom generation to pay benefits for older, retired Americans.

"Currently, about 97 cents out of every dollar you put into Social Security goes to my mother," he said. "Ninety-seven cents out of every dollar goes to pay benefits to someone else."

But when baby boomers retire, taxes on working citizens will explode, Gramm said, causing a collapse in the system.

"This year, only 200,000 Americans will turn 65 and begin collecting benefits. In 14 years, 1.6 million people will turn 65, and that number won't decrease for 20 years," he said.

Tax increases would be inevitable under the current system, the senator said.

"If we assume that the economy will continue to grow as fast as it has in the last 25 years and that immigration stays the same, we will still in 25 years have a payroll tax that's twice as high as it is now," he said. "That's an increase from 15 percent to 35 percent to fund Social Security and Medicare.

"The average-income family making between $39,000 to $49,000 per year will have taxes on 57 to 60 percent of their income."

The solution, Gramm said, is a change to an investment-based entitlement program. Working Americans would put approximately 1 percent of their incomes into private investment accounts regulated by the government for safety and security, he proposed, and that investment would fund retirement and give individuals control over their wealth.

The advantage of an investment-based system is its use of compound interest, Gramm said. It would mean a drastic reduction in payroll tax, he said, but it would produce the same or better return.

"How is it we pay for Medicare with a 1-percent investment instead of a 2.9-percent? And Social Security for a 2-percent investment rather than a 12.4-percent investment?" Gramm asked. "The difference is the power of compound interest, the power of putting capital to work, and the power of making every working American a wealth owner."

America's success in the 21st century could depend on entitlement reform, Gramm said.

"We cannot dominate the 21st century if the average tax rate of a family of four making $39,000 a year is 58 percent. In reality, the crisis I'm talking about threatens a very bright future," he said.

The need for reform is a pressing one, Gramm said, because baby boomers are nearing retirement age.

"If we let the first baby boomer retire before we fix Social Security and Medicare, it cannot be fixed without putting Americans through a gut-wrenching political experience," he said.

Gramm also said that the reform, when it takes place, will be a challenge.

"The question is, do we have the will to change it? I think we know how to do it, but it will be a question of American leadership. It will be a question of the American people's ability to ferret out the truth and understand it. It is going to be a very important debate," he said.

Following the lecture, Gramm answered several audience members' questions. He also committed to spearheading the reform movement.

"Anyone who tries to tackle this, I think, is going to get mugged politically," an audience member said. "Do you see anyone out there on the horizon who will have the political courage to take this measure on?"

"Yeah," Gramm replied. "Me."

Delta Chi to buy Phi Delta Theta house; fraternity to adjust to organized living

MATT KREPS
staff writer

After six years of living on their own, Delta Chi fraternity members will have a house to call its own.

The fraternity plans to purchase the Phi Delta Theta fraternity house at 508 Sunset Ave. The fraternity will take possession during the summer.

"We'll actually have a physical house now that people can actually recognize as the Delta Chi's," Corey Rasmussen, Delta Chi president, said.

The Delta Chis plan to move in next fall and expect to fill the house to capacity, he said. The Phi Delt house has living space for 60 men.

Rasmussen said the fraternity would have about 40 members who plan to move into the house. The other spots would be filled by the fall 1998 pledge class.

The Phi Delts plan to build a new house in the next few years.

Jorge Gaona, Phi Delt president, said the fraternity purchased a plot of land on Claflin Road near the Chase Manhattan Apartments.

The planning for the new house is still in the earliest phases, Gaona said. The Phi Delt housing organization will begin working on the new facilities plan in upcoming months.

GREEK LIFE

"We are going to start working on a new house, but all the specifics haven't been announced," he said.

The land for the new house has an annex the fraternity members will live in until the new facilities are built.

Gaona said the old house was built in 1939 but is still in good condition. The second floor and kitchen were recently renovated. More could be done, depending on what kind of work Delta Chi wants to put into it, he said.

Rasmussen said Delta Chi will evaluate what work it would do during the summer.

The fraternity intends to do some construction on the facility.

The biggest challenge for Delta Chi will be adjusting to living in an organized house, Rasmussen said.

Many of the members have lived in apartments or rented houses since joining the fraternity.

They will have to adjust to sharing rooms and being closer together.

However, Rasmussen expects the change to make the house stronger.

"I think it's going to be a very positive thing," he said.

Nation's oldest subway system celebrates centennial

ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON — In some ways, America's oldest subway is its newest, thanks to some state-of-the-art upgrades. Still, the veteran underground system known by its nickname, "the T," is undeniably feeling its age.

The Massachusetts Bay Transportation Authority, which formally celebrates its 100th anniversary on Tuesday, has added an ultramodern control center, the nation's newest commuter rail service and new subway cars and trolleys on two of its four rapid transit branches.

On the other hand, commuters on one line are entering a second year of delays and diversions as an ancient signal system damaged in a flood is finally replaced.

"We're going to be better for it," said Robert Price, the system's general manager. "We may be the oldest, but every other city that's ever gone to build a system — they came here."

The first subway in America opened Sept. 1, 1897, though officials have chosen to commemorate the centennial seven weeks late to coincide with Tuesday's bicentennial of another Boston institution: the USS Constitution.

By the end of the 19th century, Boston's narrow streets had become so clogged by horse-drawn trolleys that it was said pedestrians could walk to work on their roofs. The solution: put the people underground for the short distance from Boylston Street to Park Street.

Workers dug up 70,000 cubic yards of dirt, along with 1,000 bodies that had to be exhumed and reburied.

On the first day of service, 100,000 people tried the subway. One hundred and seventy-five jammed onto the open-sided car designed to carry 50 for the first trip, and 56 didn't pay the fare. Today, 700,000 people use the system every week.

Since the first short stretch of subway opened, it has grown to four main lines connecting 10 towns surrounding Boston. Since the 1960s they have been identified by their colors: red blue, green and orange. It's now the sixth-busiest mass transit system in the nation.

The new-and-improved Old Colony Railroad commuter line opened Sept. 29 to high ridership after a -year, $537 million refurbishment. New cars are running on the Red Line. Low-floor trolleys will debut next year on the Green Line, and commuter ferry service continues to expand.

National Alcohol Awareness Week relies on personal decisions

Awareness weeks often bring to light issues of great importance or relevance. Active student groups also plan activities in observation and promotion.

However, they can often pass without any real consideration of the issues or activities or any result in behavioral modification.

Let's not let this week's National Collegiate Alcohol Awareness Week become one of those casualties.

In direct response to alcohol-related deaths among the pledge classes of fraternities across the United States, national chapters such as Phi Gamma Delta have implemented plans to go dry by the year 2000.

GAMMA, a relatively new campus organization (just three years old), represents Greeks Advocating the Mature Management of Alcohol. GAMMA has organized several campus events to commemorate this week's cause.

An informational table outside the K-State Student Union during the K-State Health and Fitness Fair Tuesday will educate students on the physical effects and realities of different levels of alcohol use.

On Wednesday, students are asked to observe the luminaries which represent the 46 people between the ages of 18 and 25 who died in alcohol-related deaths in Kansas during 1996.

Throughout the week, students should also wear purple ribbons to show their support for these goals.

The greek system at K-State has done a good job of organizing outlets, such as GAMMA and the designated driver programs, which provide an opportunity for mature alcohol management.

However, alcohol management is about individual decisions. All the well-intentioned programs and awareness weeks cannot force students to handle their alcohol intake responsibly.

Activities this week should educate students about consequences and choices. However, it's your decision whether this week will result in positive individual decisions.

Hiding behind worc

Unsigned note brings anger, fear – not love

VIEWPOINT

MARY RENEE SMITH

MARY RENEE SMITH is a sophomore in speech. You can send e-mail to Mary at mojo@ksu.edu.

I refuse to talk about religion.

Who, what, when, where, why and how anybody chooses to worship or not worship some kind of higher power or force is none of my business.

And frankly, I find religion boring.

Recently someone called me a chicken and dared me to go to church. Wow, there's a way to win me over to a god. If they would have double-dog dared me, I would have had to go. A triple-dog dare and I would have been there early with a friend or two.

I joke about it now, but in all seriousness, I was scared.

Wednesday, I went to my mailbox at home and there was a letter for me. It was hand-written with no return address and a Topeka postmark. I thought, "Cool, someone sent me a letter." I went inside to the kitchen and opened the envelope. Not a letter was inside but a yellow piece of paper, folded up all awkwardly.

I unfolded the paper and read the top of what was now obviously a flyer of some sort. "Revival Services" it said at the top. I laughed. It is amazing the mailing lists you get on if you have a Montgomery Ward credit card.

Looking down the page I noted the name and address of a local church. No problem so far — so I got some junk mail about a church service.

It is what is at the bottom of this flyer that frightened me.

Handwritten in all capital letters was the following:

MARY,

ARE YOU TOO CHICKEN TO BRING YOUR LIFESTYLE UNDER THE TRUE LIGHT OF THE GOSPEL? I THINK YOU ARE. YOU WON'T RUN FROM GOD FOREVER. I DARE YOU TO ATTEND!

For a moment, I wondered which lifestyle they were talking about. The lifestyle that is reading "The Hobbit" to my children before bed? The lifestyle that spends three hours in the store picking out the perfect pumpkin for Halloween?

I'm fairly sure they meant the bisexuality thing and maybe the queer activist part.

A flood of emotion ran over me. Anger that someone would dare send something like this to me. Anger that someone would call me a chicken and then not have the guts to sign their name or return address.

I have always said I am not afraid of Jesse Helms or Fred Phelps on the corner — at least I know what they believe and can spot them in a crowd. But those people who wear suits and go to normal jobs, those people who hide their beliefs and send anonymous letters in the mail – they are the ones who frighten me.

I have some strong beliefs about some controversial things, but I have never hidden behind anything. My face and my name are right here. You know who I am and can spot me in a crowd. I will say anything I say in print and face to face with anyone who asks.

Who's the chicken?

Right after the anger came the fear.

Someone who obviously feels very strongly about their beliefs, strong enough to do this, knows where I live. They know where my children and fiancé live. They have invaded my home.

So it's just a letter. I get hate mail e-mail — I'm used to it. People ha written letters to the editor and calle the Collegian newsroom. I think freedom of speech is important. I want to know what I write makes people think and talk to those around them.

But there is something different about someone who will take the time to look up my address, hand write a message like that and then mail it to me. That is a lot of motivation. That is a lot of hate.

I actually thought about going to the Revival Service. I'd like to hold up this flyer and ask if the person who wrote it would like to face me and talk about his or her beliefs. I really would like to understand what motivates people to take action like this.

I don't mind admitting I am scared. I want everyone in this church to know that what this person wrote frightens me and those who love me. I want them to know that fear is not a reason to love God.

Maybe I live in a fairy-tale world, but I think most members of this congregation would be ashamed of what this person had done. Most Christians I know are loving individuals who respect me for who I am and love me as a creation of God even if they believe God disapproves of my "lifestyle."

Homecoming should unite campus organizations

t was on Wednesday that a thought struck me. And when it did, it hit me hard and knocked me over. I started to bleed, because it was a big thought.

This had been an unusual Wednesday. Usually on Wednesday, I'm in class for 25 hours out of the day, and I go home and study or sleep, which is basically the same thing.

VIEWPOINT

JON KURCHE

JON KURCHE is a freshman in physics. You can send e-mail to Jon at jsk6609@ksu.edu.

This Wednesday, however, I found myself in Ahearn Field House, home of the K-State Volleyball Team and the K-State Lawn Dart squad.

Wednesday was the preliminary round of body building, which is part of the Homecoming competition here at K-State. Body building involves cheering and throwing girls in the air and dancing, or, as professional body builders put it, "posing" and "spiriting" and "dancing."

Professional body builders, by the v names like "cheerleader," and "pe throws girls around." Body building ac nothing to do with lifting weights. Unl you are lifting a girl whose bones are l lead, in which case you need to be caref drop her. Lead is a soft metal. If she fa will undoubtedly hit you on the head.

It didn't ever matter what stunt I v doing — if somebody fell, my head wo get hit. I could be standing on a balc above everybody else, and someo would still manage to land on my head.

In addition to body building, the were several other competitions, inclu ing the Spirit Banner, where you p expensive art supplies together and wri things like "Now is the hour for pur purple power." The real competitio involves seeing which entrants coul fudge their receipts best, because there is a $50 spending cap.

There's also a float competition; a "Pant the Chant" competition, which involved participants dancing, singing, chanting and using their bodies as percussion instruments; and a sleep-deprivation competition, which tests who can get the least amount of sleep and still make it to class the next morning. It's the competition I won.

But that night at Ahearn was something special.

The whole hemisphere of the stadium we occupied was filled with screaming college kids and adults. Each greek house or residence hall was yelling some form of cheer, be it "Gamma Gamma Delt-a, we wish we hadn't smelt-ya," or "Haymaker and Ford, we cheer for room and board."

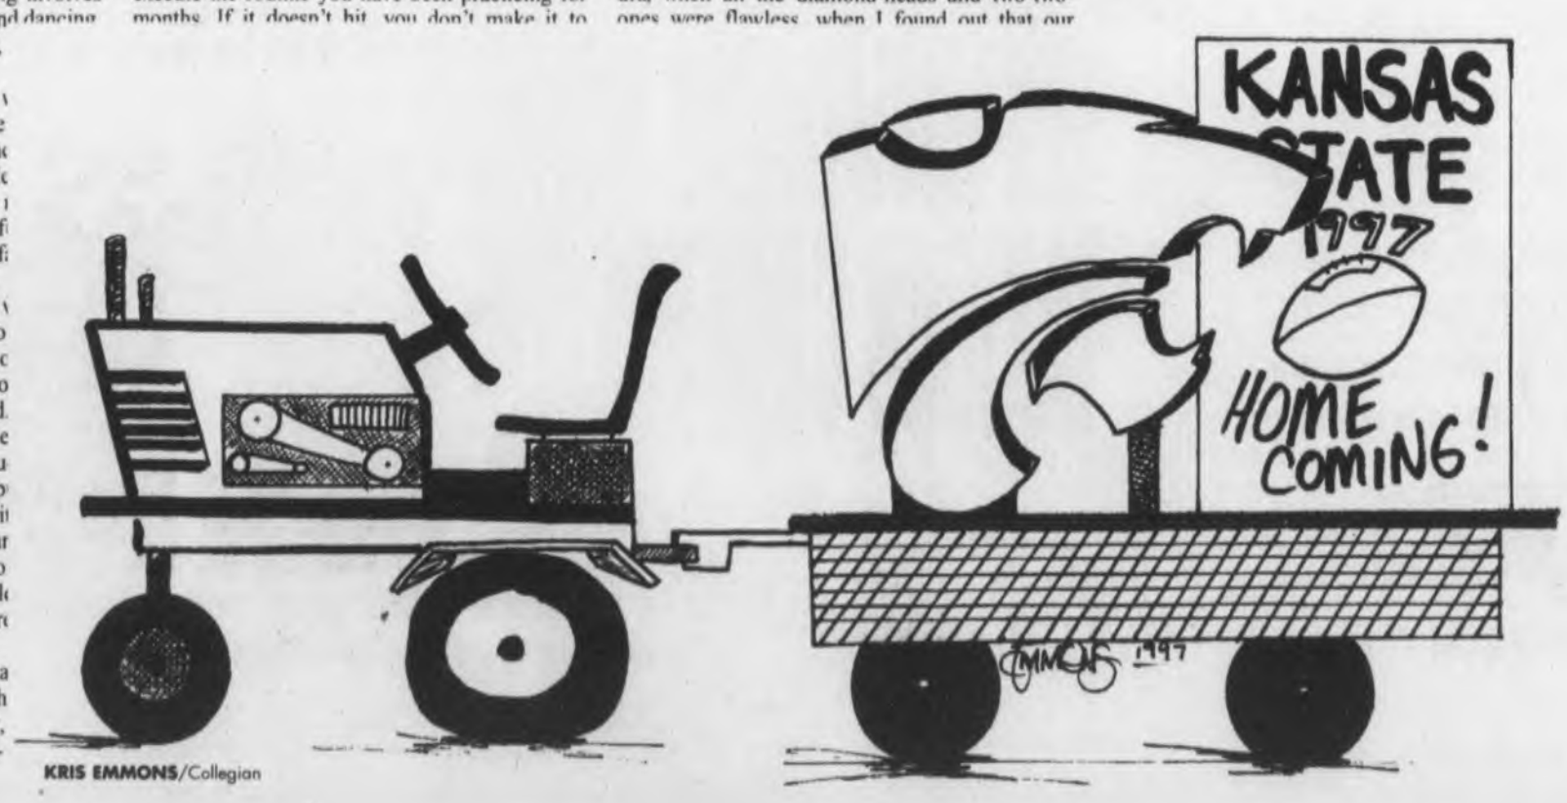
Now imagine that you were at the center of that environment. The whole world was a blur of colors and sounds. Every individual in the stands combined to form a symphony of overwhelming enthusiasm. It invaded every sense, every nerve, penetrated your entire body until you were filled by the buzz which surrounded you.

Imagine that you were preparing yourself to execute the routine you have been practicing for months. If it doesn't hit, you don't make it to building, but words don't quite do it justice.

It was in this environment that the thought struck me.

Where were the residence halls? Where were all the minority-focused organizations? Why is everybody in separate competitions?

I had this thought as I looked across the stands toward the residence halls. Although they had very solid routines, they only had a fraction of the people present to compete. They were not executing the complicated maneuvers or dances the greeks had. They didn't have the uniforms or jackets. They didn't have their residents there to support the team. They weren't quite as pumped.



There is no reason those residents couldn't have blown away the greeks with their routines, no reason they couldn't have looked every bit as impressive. What happened? Is homecoming so greek-centric? How much of campus was missing out on the feeling I had when I hit every stunt I did, when all the diamond-heads and two-two-ones were flawless, when I found out that our had last week?

I get the feeling that only half the campus would know what I was talking about if I just said "spirit banner," or "pomping," and that angers me. Everybody should have as much fun as I have had.

Recent years have seen a drive by the Association of Residence Halls trying to increase homecoming involvement. I respect that, but ARH needs to work harder.

The University Homecoming Committee needs to work harder. Greek Affairs needs to work harder. The alumni need to work harder. Propaganda needs to be out the very first week of school. Everybody in Ford, Marlatt, Smurthwaite, Putnam, Black Student Union — every residence hall, every organization — needs to be involved.

I salute the residence hall participants who were in Ahearn that night. I'll bet they had fun last week.

Nurse points out that Collegian photograph glamorized smoking

Editor,

As a nurse, health educator and a member of the Riley County Great American Smoke Out Committee, I can't let the picture in Wednesday's Collegian go without comment. It pictured a student having a cigarette break with no article about smoking or cigarettes anywhere in the paper. Are college students to assume an appropriate break should include tobacco?

The tobacco companies glamorize and promote the addiction to tobacco very well, and I don't believe college newspapers should assist in that promotion.

Cigarette smoking costs the Kansas economy $594 million each year in health care and lost productivity costs.

According to a recent Harvard study, 31 percent of students smoke, and that number has greatly increased in the past five years.

In this day of rising health care and college costs, please don't promote a substance that greatly increases those costs, as well as puts those students at risk for life-threatening illnesses.

Join the Great American Smoke Out on Nov. 27. In the United States, tobacco kills more than 400,000 each year. Is this what we want for K-State students — an addiction and death?

Contact Lafene Student Health Center for assistance in stopping tobacco use.

Students pick Heinrich, Reser as new K-State Ambassadors

KERRY BOYDSTON
staff reporter

Jason Heinrich and Sara Reser will be packing their bags with purple pride and traveling around Kansas to promote K-State for the next 12 months.

Heinrich, junior in industrial engineering, and Reser, junior in marketing, were selected by a student-body vote to be the 1997-98 K-State Student Ambassadors. This announcement was made at halftime of the K-State vs. Texas A&M football game Saturday.

"It was a great feeling just to hear my name called in front of everyone at the football game, as well as just going through the entire selection process," Heinrich said. "I feel it was a great group of candidates, and I am honored to be one of the two selected."

Reser said she really didn't get too nervous during the announcement.

"Halftime went so fast, I didn't have time to think about being nervous. But it was really thrilling standing in front of all the purple K-State fans," she said.

The newly elected ambassadors will spend a majority of their time attending events on behalf of K-State.

"Tuesday is our first activity as K-State Student Ambassadors, and I am ready for it," Reser said.

"We will be going to college nights to promote college life at K-State, giving presentations and greetings on behalf of K-State and also attending alumni functions, such as Catbacker events," Heinrich said.

"I am really looking forward to going and helping at these events and promoting the recruitment process for K-State."

Traveling to and from activities over the next year will keep Heinrich and Reser on a booked schedule.

"I'm sure there will be a lot of little things that we will have to do that neither Jason or I know about yet," Reser said. "I'm ready for those little things."

Investigators accuse Marines of stealing, selling explosives

ASSOCIATED PRESS

CAMP LEJEUNE, N.C. — Marines accused of stealing weapons from Camp Lejeune were motivated by money but apparently were not an organized ring dealing with terrorists, authorities said Friday.

"There are no groups, no connections, no conspiracies that we've been able to determine," said Neill Robins, head of the Naval Criminal Investigative Service.

The five Marines still in custody Friday are suspected of hiding extra explosives from training exercises and seeking out buyers. Federal agents acting as middlemen bought the stolen explosives and then sold them to gun enthusiasts searching for greater firepower.

The Marines appeared to be seeking cash as a reward for taking advantage of sloppy inventory controls, said Col. Joe Yannessa, head of base security.

Fourteen people suspected of trafficking military explosives were arrested Thursday. Six of the suspects were Marines, although one was released and returned to his unit.

The arrests were part of an ongoing 18-month investigation dubbed "Operation Longfuse" into the theft of military weapons, including rocket launchers, machine guns, mines, mortars and grenades. Much of the ordnance was stolen from Camp Lejeune, a Marine base in eastern North Carolina.

BIG 12 CONFERENCE UPDATE

K-State (5-1, 2-1 in Big 12) seemed to come together at just the right time to explode on the Aggies. The defense held A&M's running game to negative 35 yards, and the offense came alive in the second half for a 36-17 victory that knocked the Aggies (5-1, 2-1) from the unbeaten ranks.

Big 12 teams were suffering similar fates throughout the league.

Texas Tech (3-3, 2-1) rarely crossed midfield and was blanked by Nebraska (6-0, 3-0) 29-0. Texas (3-3, 1-2) lost to Missouri (4-3, 2-2) for the first time since 1916, 37-29. Oklahoma (3-4, 1-2) was the only Big 12 South winner, holding off Baylor's (1-5, 0-3) late charge for a 24-23 victory.

Unbeaten Oklahoma State (6-0, 3-0) took the day off.

Baylor coach Dave Roberts, trying desperately to get a victory for the Bears, went for a two-point conversion after scoring with 38 seconds left against the Sooners, rather than go for a tie and send the game into overtime.

Oklahoma safety Terry White foiled the attempt by intercepting Jeff Watson's pass in the end zone.

"We felt like if we could go up on them, we'd be in a little better position with 30-something seconds left," Roberts said. "They're not the passing team that some other people are, they'd have to run some option. We felt this was the time. We didn't want to be in an overtime situation, so we went for the two and the win."

Oklahoma coach John Blake was pleased with Roberts' decision but said he'd have gone for overtime.

"I would've kicked the ball and made sure it went into overtime," Blake said. "I would've given our team a second chance to win."

Texas' defense didn't give the Longhorns much chance against Missouri, which ran up 518 yards of offense. The Tigers went ahead 17-16 with five seconds left in the first half, and they had a 20-point fourth quarter to seal the victory.

"This was embarrassing," Texas safety Donald McCowen said. "We are a better team than Missouri. We are capable of beating anyone but not when we play like this. The game just got out of control."

The Longhorns dropped to a 3-3 record for the season after talking about competing for the national title in preseason.

The Red Raiders couldn't get anything going against the Cornhuskers although they trailed by only 13-0 at the half.

"I thought at the end of the first half, we were still in the ball game," Red Raider coach Spike Dykes said. "I know we weren't dominating the game or anything like that. But when you're down by 13 at the half in a college football game, you've got a chance."

But the Cornhuskers got stronger as the game progressed. It was Tech's first regular season shutout since losing to Arkansas 31-0 in 1987. They lost to Iowa 27-0 in last year's Alamo Bowl.

John Hessler, his confidence already badly shaken, endured a week in quarterback limbo, wondering if he had lost his starting job.

Given only a lukewarm vote of confidence, he responded with his best game of the season, leading Colorado to a 42-6 rout of Kansas on Saturday night.

The embattled Hessler, who had thrown 10 interceptions compared to just three interceptions in the first five games, passed for two touchdowns and ran for another against Kansas.

He completed 15 of 19 passes — including his last eight — for 188 yards with no interceptions.

"I felt I did my job today," Hessler said. "I've got to play like this every game. I thought we moved the ball well, and now we're going to take this win and move on with it."

WOMAN KICKER MAKES HISTORY

SALEM, Ore. — A female placekicker at Willamette University on Saturday became the first woman ever to play in a college football game.

Liz Heaston, a 20-year-old junior, kicked two extra points as Willamette beat Linfield College 27-0.

Heaston, a standout player on the school's women's soccer team, was recruited by football coach Dan Hawkins to kick PATs for the Bearcats, who entered Saturday's game ranked No. 5 in the NAIA.

At a news conference after Saturday's game, Heaston downplayed her accomplishment, saying she didn't want a whole lot of attention.

Officials from both the NCAA and the NAIA couldn't find record of a woman ever playing in a regular-season game.

TEXAS A&M'S SHANE LECHLER grabs the face mask of K-State's David Allen Saturday at KSU Stadium. K-State defeated the Aggies 36-17.
CLIF PALMBERG Collegian

Saturday at KSU Stadium the K-State Wildcats silenced all doubtful critics with a convincing 36-17 win over No. 14 Texas A&M. The Cats shut down an Aggie rushing offense that averaged 278 yards per game to just negative 35 yards.

UNSTOPPABLE

K-State could have been charged with holding during the entire 36-17 Wildcat victory over the No. 14 Texas A&M Aggies Saturday.

The Cats held an offense that has scored 56 points in each of three games this season to four first downs, a field goal and two touchdowns for 17 points and 90 yards total offense.

The Cats' "Lynch Mob" defense also held an Aggie rushing offense that had averaged 278 yards a game to negative 35 yards.

And the infamous Aggie "Wrecking Crew" defense held no weight against the Cats' offense. The Cats racked up 247 net rushing yards against a team used to giving up an average of 85 yards a game. Senior running back Mike Lawrence rushed for a season-high 105 yards.

"We like to win, and we like to play hard," Cats right tackle Ryan Young said. "Their front was good, but I think we did well running the ball against them."

What was the Cats' game plan for the success they achieved? Stopping the run, according to Coach Bill Snyder.

"Defensively, we did control them," Snyder said. "I can't tell you we expected to hold them to four first downs."

Aggie tailback and returner Dante Hall was stopped on the first play of the game. He left the game with a bruised knee and never returned.

"We lost our starting tailback at the beginning of the game, and we already had two starting tackles out," Aggie coach R.C. Slocum said. "All of that had a significant effect on the outcome of the game."

Snyder said Hall's absence affecting the game was debatable.

"I think if he had been their only running back, it would have been a major blow," Snyder said. "All their running backs are excellent running backs."

Aggie running back Sirr Parker took most of the snaps at running back and returned kickoffs. Wide receiver Chris Taylor assumed the punt-returning duties.

Cats extend winning streak to four

DAN MERKER
staff writer

The K-State volleyball team was without one-third of its starters for its matches against Iowa State and Missouri this weekend, but it was difficult to tell. The Wildcats won both of their matches 3-0.

K-State was playing without senior setter Devon Ryning, who is recovering from oral surgery, and junior right-side hitter Alexis Shepherd, who was left off the trip by Coach Jim McLaughlin for unspecified reasons.

Sophomores Linsey Luther and Heather Lindell took the places of Ryning and Shepherd, respectively, and the team didn't suffer.

"I thought they both did well," McLaughlin said. "Lindell can help upgrade the team — her strength is blocking. She played her strengths. Linsey was excellent when she started making adjustments with her feet ... and let our offense get into a rhythm."

The Wildcats disposed of the Cyclones quickly. They jumped out to leads of 8-1 and 14-3 in game one before Iowa State rallied to 14-7. K-State got the final point of the game to win 15-7, and in the process held Iowa State's offense to a negative .115 hitting percentage.

K-State continued to dominate games two and three. The Cats jumped out to an 11-0 lead in game two and cruised to win 15-7. In the third game, K-State again began strong to lead 11-2 on its way to a 15-6 final-game victory.

The Cats held the Cyclones to a negative hitting percentage in games one and three, and Iowa State ended the match hitting negative .022.

Saturday, the Cats tallied their fourth-straight conference win to improve to 13-6 overall and 5-3 in Big 12 play. They beat Missouri for the seventh consecutive time and have not lost to the Tigers since 1994.

K-State hit .400 in the first game and jumped out to a 9-0 lead. The Cats had no problem holding on to beat the Tigers 15-7.

In game two, Missouri jumped ahead several times early until the Cats battled back to tie the game 8-8. Missouri rallied to take a 12-9 lead, but K-State scored five straight points to go ahead 14-12. The Tigers battled back to tie the game at 14, but the Cats managed to win 16-14.

Game three was close early, with the game tied 8-8 at one point, but the Cats rallied to score the final seven points and close out the match with a 15-8 win.

'Lynch Mob' defense clobbers A&M offense

SAM FELSENFELD

K-State's defense knew it faced a monumental test when it confronted No. 14 Texas A&M's potent offense Saturday. After all, the Aggies brought the nation's No. 1 scoring offense and the No. 5 rushing attack into Manhattan to take on the Wildcats.

Now, after the Cats' 36-17 victory over Texas A&M, to say the defensive unit passed its test would be an understatement. Grading the defensive players' efforts on Saturday would require the invention of letters higher than A.

For starters, K-State held the Aggies powerful running game 313 yards below its season average. The Aggies picked up 278 yards a carry against their first five opponents. But on Saturday, they carried the ball 17 times for negative 35 yards.

"If you can't stop the run, you can't beat anybody. That was the focus," K-State coach Bill Snyder said.

Judging by the stat sheet, the focus worked for the Cats. By taking away the running game, K-State was able to focus on the Aggies passing attack and shut down the offense. The Cats forced nine Texas A&M punts and only let the Aggies hold onto the ball for 18:07. Also, the Aggies were only able to run 37 plays. Keeping the ball in the Cats' possession helped wear down the Aggie defense, allowing K-State to run up 36 points.

"Give the K-State defense all the credit," Texas A&M linebacker Dat Nguyen said. "They came in with a good game plan and executed. You can't stop an offense like that. We just tried to contain it."

While the Cats stopped the Aggies ground game, they also embarrassed its scoring offense, which topped all of Division I-A football by posting at least 46.6 points on the scoreboard every Saturday. Aside from a second-quarter field goal, the Aggies only

'Playing God'

Blood bath fails to revive plot

JOHN FRANSON
staff writer

Is "The X-Files" stud David Duchovny on his way to becoming the next David Caruso?

Caruso, if you'll remember, was the actor who quit his role on "NYPD Blue" to become a big-screen big-shot. But after two commercial and critical flops, Caruso vanished and is only now attempting a TV comeback.

Movie Review

Enter Duchovny with "Playing God," his much-hyped bid at becoming a movie leading man. Will it, like Caruso's "Kiss of Death" and "Jade," flop? More importantly, is it any good?

The answer to both questions is, fortunately and unfortunately, no.

Duchovny does have bigger star power than Caruso, and, unlike Caruso, Duchovny already has a large, rabid fan-base that will see him in anything. This movie will likely do good business.

However, if you're not already a Duchovny fan, there might not be much here to hold your interest.

Duchovny plays Eugene Sands, a drug-addicted former surgeon that was stripped of his license after he botched a surgery under the influence of amphetamines. His days now spent looking for opportunities to get high, he visits a seedy nightclub to score his drug supply. When thugs open fire on a man at the nightclub, Sands uses a quick improvisation to save the man's life.

His heroics catch the attention of a local crime boss, Raymond Blossom (Timothy Hutton), who convinces the reluctant Sands to become his "gunshot doctor." Because taking Blossom's henchmen to the hospital is strictly a no-no, Sands is required to work on them in a number of unpleasant places and situations.

Caught between the two men is Blossom's sultry girlfriend, Claire (Angelina Jolie), who mistrusts Sands and is repelled by his drug habit, yet finds herself attracted to him. Jolie ("Hackers") gives the film's most interesting and memorable performance, convincingly displaying a wide range of emotions, as well as cool-headed intelligence.

Duchovny, by contrast, seems bored by the film. He's given even more funny one-liners than his sarcastic TV character Fox Mulder, but that's about it. He's easily lost amid the large cast of quirky killers and psychopaths who work for and do business with Blossom.

The miscast Hutton gives his best, playing the character with neurotic, menacing bombast, but it is useless — he simply doesn't look like a crime boss. Duchovny looks like Hercules next to the shrimpy Hutton.

Despite finally getting interesting in its second half with a plot twist and the sexual-tension-filled relationship between Duchovny's and Jolie's characters, "Playing God" is ultimately forgettable. Director Andy Wilson tries to liven up the dull, almost non-existent plot with fast camera work, a rockin' soundtrack and an overdose of blood, but manages only to bury what little emotional resonance the story had. Add to this a handful of drastic leaps in logic, and the result is a movie with a trifling plot that still manages to confuse you.

Duchovny's career will be safe as long as "The X-Files" keeps him visible, but let's hope he chooses some weightier material for his next big-screen foray. In the meantime, if you want to see Duchovny in something that's actually good, the new season of "The X-Files" is not that far away.

3rd BirdHouse show defines concert series

SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
staff writer

They say that the third time is the charm, but for the Birdhouse Acoustic Series, they should make an exception.

Music Review

The charm was there for the first performance with Greg Greenway and Don Conoscenti, it was there for the second by Pierce Pettis and it was still there with David Roth Saturday night. The third time was not the charm — it was the definition.

With a concert series, one automatically looks for pattern, trends, similarities - an attendance of about 100, an interaction between musician and audience and about 20 story-telling songs that range from the tragic to the triumphant.

Roth, however, supplied a style so radically different from his three predecessors that the listener can see the real range possible between different artists in the same genre of folk/acoustic.

The Chicago native said although he guesses to have played 35 to 40 states over the years, this is his first in Kansas. "It wasn't like I was ignoring Kansas," Roth said, "I just didn't know what the venues were here."

Two years ago, however, he met Miner Seymour, who books musicians in Moundridge, Kan., and it led him to contact Birdhouse operator David Kamerer. The two communicated via e-mail for six months prior to the concert setting things up, and met face to face the day of the performance.

Beginning the night with an autobiographical song of his earlier life, the Chicago native says it set a quick foundation. "Saves a lot of talk," Roth said. "I'll be talking all night."

Unlike performers with an equal blend of vocals and instrumental in their work, Roth seems to be a singer first and foremost. Although his work during the night on the guitar, piano and three-chambered ocarina was impressive, it took a distant second to impossibly long vocal notes so clear and audible that the performance almost came across as a musical Landon Lecture (except less political).

Roth is as much a showman as he is a musician. As a result, the usual audience/artist banter of the past two performances was taken to new heights by Roth, who paused in between songs to show the people his scrapbook of letters he's seen and collected over the years.

Some are letters to magazines that inspired the songs. Some letters are responses to his own songs. Regardless, they provide a strong background before and after each number and alleviate what would otherwise be an emotional roller coaster.

Among the favorites of the night was a half mime, half opera rendition by Roth of how he got the job to sing the national anthem at the Chicago Bulls vs. New York Knicks game.

Scoring particularly high with the thirtysomethings and over in the crowd were "Don't Should On Me" and "Masters Degree" as epics of matrimonial compromise. For those even more easily entertained, the infamous "Farting Dog Song" about his real-life dog Oly sent the audience into fits of laughter.

But he still made the transition smoothly to numbers like "Manuel Garcia," the true story of a man's fight against cancer, asking the auditorium lights to be turned off while he played.

Did he plan to originally play it that way? "I've done it before," Roth replied, "but I wasn't sure if I would here. It was kind of a spur of the moment decision." His reasons for the darkness were to make those listening to the song, some possibly with cancer memories of their own, be able to laugh, cry or just think over the lyrics without being in plain view of their neighbors. "This takes away some of the self-conciousness," Roth said.

Otherwise, Roth said he likes an audience that he can see listening and reacting. "Audiences that are more demonstrative are easier for me to read. I'd rather be playing in a smaller, more obscure place where I know the people are really listening than to be in a bigger place with distractions."

As for his future, Roth seems to be keeping his options open.

"I'm not sure I'll always be doing music," Roth said.

He elaborated that although he loves the places and the music, he might become an mechanic, a gym teacher, a carpenter or even open a retreat center in Cape Cod with his wife Tricia. It all just depends on how things work out.

"If I choose to keep doing music, the work is there and I've seen amazing things where the music has taken me," Roth said.

scored one touchdown, which was set up by an interception return that gave them first-and-goal from the K-State 1-yard line.

"K-State is really well-coached and did a great job today. Their defense did it," Aggies quarterback Randy McCown said. "They stopped us, and we never got momentum. We would get to the top of the mountain but couldn't get anything together."

K-State set a school record with its rushing defense. Texas A&M's negative 35 yards rushing was the lowest total by an opponent in the 102-year history of K-State football. Also, the Aggies' 90 yards of total offense were the lowest by an opponent since Northern Illinois gained 84 against the Cats in 1995.

Also, while the rushing defense was busy setting records, the pass defense continued its consistent play. The secondary extended its string of consecutive quarters without allowing a passing touchdown to 22. The only touchdown the Cats have allowed in the air this year came in the second quarter of K-State's season-opener at Northern Illinois.

The secondary credited part of its success to a player who didn't even put on any pads Saturday. Former Wildcat Clyde Johnson, now a defensive back for the Kansas City Chiefs, gave the Cats a pregame talk that set the stage for their performance.

Johnson told them to come out fired up early and set the tone of the game. On the Aggies' first play from scrimmage, Dante Hall, Texas A&M's leading rusher, was knocked out of the game after a hit by K-State defensive back Dyshod Carter. The injury was unintentional, but it gave the early edge in momentum to the Cats.

"Everything he (Johnson) told us came true," free safety Cephus Scott said. "He said if we hit them hard early and take their mind out of the game, then they would be thinking instead of playing. And that's what they were doing."

K-State outhit Missouri .252 to .143 for the match and was led by freshman middle blocker Kelle Branting, who hit .667 for the match and only had one hitting error.

Luther had 42 assists and 12 digs to lead the team.

McLaughlin said he was satisfied with the performance. "Any time you make a wholesale adjustment to the lineup, we're happy to get the wins," he said. "We played our best volleyball when we had to. Start to finish we weren't very good, but we were good when we had to be."

The Cats return to action tonight as they take a break from conference play to face the Drake Bulldogs at 7 p.m. at Ahearn Field House.

Admission is free with a student ID, and the match can be heard on KSDB-FM 91.9.

GAME

Cat punt returner David Allen set a school record for punt return yardage with 125 returning yards. His longest return was for 48 yards at the beginning of the second quarter, which set the Cats up for their second field goal.

"I thought David Allen made some things happen for us," Snyder said. "Although we did give up seven on the punting game."

The Cats did not punt until the second quarter, scoring a touchdown and two field goals in their first three trips to the red zone in the first. A surprise play by the Cats in the first quarter with five minutes to go found place kicker Jamie Rheem recovering his own onsides kick.

"We practiced it a lot this week," Rheem said. "I kind of glanced up as I kicked it onside, and there wasn't anyone there."

Snyder was pleased with Rheem's effort.

"Jamie Rheem was outstanding," Snyder said. "The onsides kick takes a master's hands to do that."

Midway through the second quarter, Cats' quarterback Michael Bishop took a hit in a pile that Snyder labeled an ankle sprain after the game. Back-ups Casey Vidricksen and Jonathan Beasley saw the field momentarily, but Bishop came back to lead the Cats in the second half.

The Cat special teams crew took a costly blow at the beginning of the third quarter. Cat punter James Garcia fumbled the snap, and his last-minute punt attempt was blocked and recovered by Aggie defensive back Ronald Patton. Aggie running back Michael Williams ran the ball back 27 yards for A&M's first touchdown of the game.

This score put the Aggies within six points, 16-10. But memories of last year's 17-point, first-half lead being cut to three by the game's end kept the Cats' backs up.

"They kicked our butt in the second quarter last year," right guard Jeremy Martin said. "We weren't going to let that happen this year."

Bishop was visibly limping on the field, and the offensive line made it top priority to protect its play-caller, Cat center Kendyl Jacox said.

"We were just trying to keep them off of him," Jacox said. "They kept going after him, and we took it upon ourselves to make sure he was protected."

With the added protection, Bishop kicked in the passing game. Bishop completed 10 of 21 passes for 173 yards, with eight completions coming in the second half.

"Our passing game is making some progress," Snyder said. "Not just in the second half of the game, but in practice as well."

But that passing game also cost the Cats seven points. To begin the fourth quarter, a Bishop pass was intercepted by Aggie free safety Brandon Jennings. Jennings returned the ball to the K-State 1-yard line, where Aggie running back D'Andre Hardeman pushed the ball into the end zone for Aggie touchdown No. 2.

Once again, the Aggies were breathing down the Cats' necks with a six-point deficit.

"We thought after that interception that they would take the momentum and come back and beat us," Cat wideout Darnell McDonald said. "But Michael Bishop started to get us pumped up on the sidelines, and he started throwing perfect passes."

From then on, the Cats dominated the play clock and the scoreboard. Two rushing touchdowns, a 20-yarder by running back Eric Hickson and a 3-yarder by fullback Brian Goolsby, put the game out of the Aggies' reach.

"What's their defense called? The Wrecking Crew?" asked Young. "We wanted to prove we have a good offense and move the ball on the Wrecking Crew."

Linebacker Mark Simoneau said the Wrecking Crew has nothing on the Lynch Mob, or at least it didn't today.

"I think we proved some things today," Simoneau said. "We even surprised ourselves."

Town's residents support sheriff facing prisoner abuse charges

ASSOCIATED PRESS

COLUMBUS, Kan. — He's been charged with misconduct and abusing prisoners, placed in the spotlight for all the wrong reasons and has appeared in court as a defendant, instead of a law enforcer.

But Cherokee County Sheriff Pat Collins has at least something going for him in southeast Kansas: a little hometown support.

"I was driving home from work ... and a man going the same direction pulled in behind me when I got to my house," Collins said. "He got out and said, 'Sheriff, I just want you to know that me and my family are with you.' I told him that I really appreciate that."

The show of approval is not surprising in Galena, where Collins has lived in the same house since 1953. Galena voters helped carry him to a re-election victory last year despite strong opposition and charges that he misused public money.

But not everybody in the county showers the 50-year-old Republican sheriff with respect. Most of those who don't like him, though, are keeping their opinions to themselves.

"It's not good for business for me to say how I really feel," said a Columbus restaurant worker. "This is a small town. Everybody knows each other."

Collins, three of his deputies and a former deputy have been charged with felony crimes and a jailer has been charged with a misdemeanor. All are accused of mistreating or hitting inmates. Collins also is charged with helping two prisoners escape and signing fraudulent income tax returns.

Collins, who earns $23,700 to run a department of 25 people, including 10 deputies, is expected to meet with county commissioners Monday to announce whether he will discipline deputies who have been charged.

Kansas Attorney General Carla Stovall filed a petition last week to oust Collins from his duties, leaving some to wonder how the county's law enforcement will operate without him.

But life in the county at the very southeast tip of the state remains unchanged. Talk of the sheriff doesn't appear to dominate conversation at local coffee shops. Residents still go to Friday night high school football games and across the state line to Joplin on Saturdays to shop, eat and see movies.

"He's always been pretty good to me," said Robert Roche, as he hosed down the driveway at Sonic Drive-In Restaurant. "I haven't heard any complaints."

Resident Lisa McDowell said Collins is a good man "who means well and really gives people the freedom to do what they want."

Roger Box, who has known Collins for 35 years, said the sheriff "just doesn't put up with any crap, and that's the way it is. If there's trouble, he goes in and stops it.

"I hear on my scanner how prisoners are always beating each other up. Well, someone has to stop them, and you have to use force if the prisoners are."

Most people who support Collins believe his troubles began when he didn't turn jail telephone money collected in 1994 and 1995 over to the county treasurer.

Kevin Cure, the county attorney at the time, looked into the matter and concluded there was no intent on Collins' part to steal from the county.

But then-county commissioner James Lucian said he wasn't satisfied with Cure's decision, and he gave Stovall a call. Her office filed charges shortly before the 1996 election campaign.

Collins won re-election despite the charges, and he said that ever since, Stovall has been "nit-picking" for any sign of misconduct because "the office of sheriff is what she's after."

But Lucian said Stovall does not have an agenda.

"Politics doesn't enter into this at all," Lucian said. "It's a matter of somebody doing their job properly. I have nothing against the sheriff. If any of this is political, it's because they (Collins and his attorney) want to say it's political."

National collegiate alcohol awareness week

This week is National Collegiate Alcohol Awareness Week, sponsored by Greeks Advocating the Mature Management of Alcohol. This week is designed to increase student awareness regarding alcohol issues and to promote the responsible use of alcohol. Throughout the week, K-State students will be wearing purple ribbons to show their support. The following is a list of activities that will be going on throughout the week.

Today/ Tuesday
- An informational table at the K-State Health and Fitness Fair, outside the K-State Student Union.

Wednesday
- 46 luminaries will be on display at participating fraternities and sororities. The luminaries represent the 46 people between the ages of 18 to 25 who died in alcohol-related vehicle accidents in Kansas during 1996.

K-State students will also be wearing purple ribbons to show their support for responsible alcohol use, Kellie McClellan, GAMMA public relations chair, said.

GAMMA is a three-year-old organization that promotes responsible alcohol use.

Two representatives are selected from fraternities and sororities to make up the membership.

April Spence, GAMMA membership chair, said the group neither condemns nor condones alcohol use but encourages its safe management.

The group tends to focus on education and awareness more than anything else, Wassberg said.

GAMMA's executive board recently distributed resource manuals with information on alcohol and safety procedures to Interfraternity and Panhellenic Council.

The group also does alcohol-related risk-management programs for greeks.

Wassberg said she doesn't know whether the group has stopped someone from doing something like driving drunk, but she said she thinks people are more aware.

"They are thinking about it more," she said.

Jerry Carter, director of facilities planning and university architect, said although he is aware of the lawsuit, he can't comment on the specifics of the project. He said it's not unusual that the state is named in the suit.

"In any kind of suit like that, when a contractor is suing an owner and an architect, they usually try to name every entity that's been involved in the project," Carter said.

Carter said although facilities staff have not been involved in the lawsuit thus far, there is the possibility they will need to work with the University Attorney's office in the future.

"The state of Kansas has the Attorney General's office that is fully capable of protecting the state's interests, just as the university has its attorneys," he said.

Carter said he did not want to speculate on the details of the lawsuit.

"Whatever the outcome, I think we still have a wonderful building," he said.

"I'm pleased we've had the kind of people we had work on this project — both the contractor and the subcontractors."

Microsoft accused of cornering Web market

▶ CORPORATION COULD PAY $1 million a day fine for browser monopoly.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Justice Department accused software giant Microsoft Corp. on Monday of using its dominant Windows 95 computer operating system to steal customers from rival Netscape's popular Internet browser.

The department's antitrust division sought an unprecedented $1-million-a-day fine that would take effect if a judge orders a halt to the challenged activity but the company persists.

"Microsoft is unlawfully taking advantage of its Windows monopoly to protect and extend that monopoly," Attorney General Janet Reno told reporters. "It's plain wrong."

Klein

The government objected to Microsoft's requirement that personal computer manufacturers that install the Windows 95 operating system on their products also license and install its Internet browser, known as Internet Explorer.

Browsers allow computer owners to easily locate information on the Internet.

The Windows operating system is used on more than 80 percent of the nation's personal computers, usually installed at the factory. But Netscape's rival Navigator is the leading Internet browser, with 62 percent of the market.

Reno

The government asked the federal court here to hold Microsoft in contempt of a 1995 court order barring the Redmond, Wash.-based company from anti-competitive licensing.

"This action is unfortunate and misguided," said Microsoft spokesman Mark Murray. "The facts will show that Microsoft is in full compliance with the consent decree."

Murray said the decree "specifically allows Microsoft to integrate new features into the operating system. That's what consumers want, and that's how the software industry has operated for years."

Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, called Reno's move "an important step toward ensuring an open, unfettered and unregulated information highway."

Promising hearings on the industry this fall, Hatch said Microsoft's success in operating systems does not "entitle Microsoft to a monopoly over desktop access to the Internet."

Consumer advocate Ralph Nader also called the Justice move "a welcome first step for consumers."

On Wall Street, Microsoft stock dipped shortly after the announcement, but closed up 25 cents a share at $132.50 on the Nasdaq stock market. Shares of Netscape closed up $4.25 at $39.25.

Justice's action comes on the heels of a lawsuit by Sun Microsystems accusing Microsoft of improperly adapting Sun's Java language for Internet Explorer.

Committee delays stadium referendum

SARA BURDETTE
staff reporter

Students, who said they aren't knowledgeable enough about the KSU Stadium expansion and they are afraid of not being able to continue their education because of increased fees, expressed concern at the Privilege Fee Committee meeting Monday.

Because of the amount of student concern, the Privilege Fee Committee pushed back the Nov. 11 referendum one week to allow more education.

The referendum would allow students to choose whether they favored the stadium expansion. A follow-up question would allow them to choose from two options. One option would increase the student seating to 9,000 and create a 50-cent per credit hour privilege fee per semester. The second option would increase seating to 10,000 and create a $1 per credit hour privilege fee per semester.

The biggest fear students had was that the team will not continue to succeed and that they will be paying off the stadium while no one is attending the games.

Athletic Director Max Urick said ticket sales would not decrease.

"There are no guarantees to this situation," he said. "We could lose the rest of the games this season, or we could win them all. I have faith we will stay strong, but there is no doubt that there is risk involved."

Urick said he believes funding for the expansion will cost $11 million rather than $15 million, however, the funding hasn't been set. Urick said he wants the referendum before funding will be established.

"We won't stop being aggressive in fund raising," Urick said.

The committee wrote a bill to send to Student Senate, pushing the date back for the referendum to allow students a week to become more educated.

In addition to the expansion, the committee discussed the Bramlage Coliseum fee for fiscal year 1999-2000.

Bramlage now has fee money in reserve because of lack of present need.

▶ What's it about?
Privilege Fee Committee reviews the budgets of organizations that receive student money through fees. Full-time students pay $251 each semester in privilege fees.

The money is dedicated to maintenance and repair of rooftop units, Bramlage Director Charlie Thomas said.

The building has 15 rooftop units that have been there for almost 10 years. Thomas said that for the first five years, nothing usually goes wrong. After that, problems are expected. In the past nine years, eight to 10 compressors have had to be replaced.

The building had a problem with 10 of the units after installment, and they had to be replaced because they were running too fast.

One of the suggestions from the Privilege Fee Committee was to cut Bramlage fees in half because it has such a large amount in reserves. Thomas said this could cause problems.

"I don't know if I'll spend $50,000 or $10,000," he said. "If you don't use it, it looks like you don't need it. It's not that you don't need it, you just don't need it now."

Thomas offered that the committee look into putting a $100,000 cap on Bramlage reserves and at the end of the fiscal year give the remaining funds back to the privilege fee reserve account, an account that is set aside for unforeseen damages or emergency funds.

The committee tabled the bill in order to research whether the cap was feasible.

K-State professor appointed chairman of production agriculture commission

AMY BICKEL
staff reporter

The Freedom to Farm bill will soon be under the watchful eye of a K-State professor.

Barry Flinchbaugh, agricultural economics professor, was named chairman of the Commission on 21st Century Production Agriculture in an announcement made by Sen. Pat Roberts, R-Kan., on Oct. 7.

Flinchbaugh

The appointment was made at Roberts' urging by Sen. Richard Lugar, R-Ind., and Rep. Robert Smith, R-Ore., chairmen of the Senate and House Agriculture Committees.

The commission was established by Roberts while he served as chairman of the House Agriculture Committee. It will examine the performance of the 1996 farm bill and make recommendations for agriculture policy after the current farm bill expires in 2002.

Eleven others were appointed to serve as members under Flinchbaugh. Most are farmers who are leaders in agriculture organizations.

"The Commission has two statutory mandates," Flinchbaugh said. "One is to look back at the first years of the farm bill and attempt to assess what has been done with cropping patterns, income, prices and exports. The second mandate is to look at the question, 'What after this farm bill?'"

Flinchbaugh helped with the makings of the 1996 farm bill.

"I served as a sounding body. I worked with his (Roberts') staff and debated the options with them. He gives me more credit than I probably deserve," he said.

As one of the top agricultural policy experts, Roberts said Flinchbaugh will do a good job to help farms and consumers.

"Whenever you have a problem, Barry is the kind of person to talk to," Roberts said. "He understands policy implications and what it means for the consumers."

Roberts said the commission will look at all effects of the farm bill, from its successes to its obstacles.

In making its recommendations for future agriculture policy, the commission will consider five options:

- Continue Freedom to Farm beyond 2002 with a $4 billion baseline budget.
- End federal farm programs altogether.
- Revert to 1985- or 1990-style farm bills.
- Install a completely new farm program that would center on revenue assurance and income stabilization.
- Revert to the 1949 Agricultural Act.

Red ribbons promote drug-free communities

A crowd cheered as a Kansas Army National Guard Blackhawk helicopter filled with military dignitaries, state representatives and senators landed at the Flint Hills Job Corps on Monday afternoon for the signing of the Red Ribbon Week Proclamation.

One of the primary goals of Red Ribbon Week is to present a unified and visible commitment toward the creation of a healthy, drug-free society.

The proclamation encourages all military, civilian, business and media officials to wear and display red ribbons throughout the week from thursday to Oct. 31.

"Drug-demand reduction is very important, and we must be involved as a team," said James F. Rueger, adjutant general of Kansas. "Drug reduction is not going to be an overnight incidence. This is something we have to continue to work on into the future."

Mayors Bruce Snead of Manhattan, Bill Levinson of Junction City, Wayne Henderson of Ogden, Kan., and Deputy Garrison Comdr. Helen Gough of Fort Riley, Kan., read and signed the proclamation that outlined criteria in compliance with the drug-free campaign.

"Military and civilian communities around the nation continue to fight drug problems and through drug education, we can work as a team to eliminate this," Snead said. "The National Red Ribbon Celebration makes citizens aware of drug problems in communities and promotes healthy and drug-free living by children and adults."

Secretary of State Ron Thornburgh urged the crowd to have the courage to fight drug problems.

"You lose so many opportunities simply because you lose direction. It doesn't matter if I tell you to use drugs or not," he said.

"You have to have courage and trust in yourself and help not only you, but your community at the same time."

Scooter may have caused $70,000 damage to ABC camera Saturday

MANHATTAN – A maintenance scooter ran over an ABC camera Saturday morning near Bramlage Coliseum and allegedly caused $70,000 in damages, according to a report filed with the K-State Police.

"It was a small scooter that they use to pick up trash around campus," Randy Slover, director of maintenance, said. "I really don't know how much damage was done. I don't know if the camera was destroyed."

Slover said he did not have any first-hand information of the incident and is planning to do more research later this week. His only knowledge of the incident came from a conversation with an area supervisor, Slover said.

Slover said he did not know who was driving the vehicle and has not yet been contacted by ABC regarding the damage to the camera.

Securities commissioner warns against bogus phone investments

TOPEKA – State Securities Commissioner David Brant on Monday warned Kansans to be wary about telephone calls from strangers offering to sell them stock.

Brant said his office has a toll-free number, (800) 232-9580, where people can check on stock offerings and those making them.

Brant said his office this year revoked the licenses of three out-of-state brokerage firms that he said dishonestly sold low-priced stocks through unsolicited phone calls to unwary investors.

He said the losses at times can be high, noting one retired Wichita couple who lost more than $50,000 because of calls from out-of-state brokers and fraudulent activity.

Brant said that in February his staff participated with 12 other states in a strike force that conducted surprise examinations of the home offices of some of these firms.

The exams revealed systematic abuses including high pressure, scripted telephone calls, unauthorized trades, unsuitable recommendations and the improper handling of customer complaints, the commissioner said.

2 teen-agers suffer injuries during Civil War re-enactments

CINCINNATI – A Civil War battle re-enactment produced real casualties with one teen-ager injured by a misfired cannon.

Brett Vicchrilli, 14, was thrown 18 feet into the air when a charge of gunpowder exploded as he was loading it into a cannon on Sunday, police officer Danny Davis said.

Vicchrilli, of Greencastle, Ind., was listed in serious condition Monday at Children's Hospital Medical Center with injuries to his right arm, face and chest.

The accident occurred in suburban North College Hill as the McCallister Battlers, a re-enactment unit from Greencastle, prepared an attack during the annual community observance. About 800 people watched the re-enactment, involving some 75 "soldiers" on each side.

Firefighters closed the festival after the cannon accident. Davis said he found no evidence of negligence.

Earlier, another teen-ager suffered a broken leg during a mock charge on Confederate soldiers.

Nevada comet could explain pre-historic life form extinction

SALT LAKE CITY – New evidence supports a theory that a comet slammed into southern Nevada some 370 million years ago and might have been the first of a series of strikes that triggered a mass extinction of many forms of life, a geologist said Monday.

Geologists Charles Sandberg of the U.S. Geological Survey, John Warme of the Colorado School of Mines and Jared Morrow of the University of Colorado studied evidence of the comet that hit roughly 130 miles northwest of Las Vegas when the region was covered by ocean.

The comet was two-thirds of a mile wide and blasted a 120-mile-wide crater on the sea floor, ripping apart a reef on what was then the continental shelf and creating 1,000-foot-high waves that carried pieces of reef as large as a half-mile wide over much of southern Nevada, Sandberg said.

By itself, the impact couldn't have caused that mass extinction. But Sandberg said researchers in recent years also found a crater and similar breccia rocks in other countries, suggesting the Devonian extinction was caused by a series of comet strikes.

Jobless rate on decline

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Because of the strong economy, state labor officials expect the Kansas unemployment rate to continue decreasing for the rest of the year, as it did in September.

The jobless rate last month was 3.6 percent, down from August's figure of 3.7 percent. The rate for September 1996 was 4.4 percent, meaning this year's figures continued to be better than last year's.

The number of Kansans who had jobs did decrease from August's record level of more than 1.33 million. But the Department of Human Resources attributed the decline to students' returning to classes and giving up summer jobs.

The department expects unemployment to continue to decrease, especially as the year-end holiday season nears and retail stores begin adding employees in anticipation of increased sales.

Spokeswoman Angela Goering said department officials are comfortable making such a prediction because, so far, only normal seasonal trends have affected unemployment rates.

"There hasn't been anything that played itself out that we weren't expecting," Goering said.

Goering said the fact that only season trends seem to affect unemployment rates is another sign that the state's economy remains healthy. The economy has led to higher-than-expected collections of tax revenues.

"There's going to be nothing dramatic that's going to happen," she said. "Our numbers are not going to change that much between now and the end of the year."

The department normally expects a decline in employment in September, when students return to high school and college classes.

Not only do students leave the job market, but teachers do as well, Goering noted. In September, the state's civilian labor force shrunk by about 8,900 people overall.

Employment by government agencies increased by more than 18,000, reflecting the return of school food service and janitorial staff.

Also, the rehiring of bus drivers helped increase transportation employment.

Overall, fewer than 1.33 million Kansans had jobs. About 50,000 were actively seeking work, about 800 fewer than in August.

Last month's figures were significantly better than the figures for September 1996. Last year, 1.27 million Kansans were employed, meaning employment this year was nearly 59,000 more in September.

Unemployment rates in two of the state's four largest metropolitan areas actually increased over the month, however. The rate went from 3.4 percent to 3.5 percent in the Wichita area and from 5 percent to 5.1 percent in the Topeka area.

Seniors getting ready to graduate in December or May might have something to smile about when it comes time to look for a job.

The Kansas unemployment rate has dropped significantly from a year ago and has already dropped .1 percent from August.

State labor officials said the September 1996 unemployment rate was at 4.4 percent while this September's rate was only 3.6 percent.

"We have more companies and employers coming to Kansas State than we ever have before," said Tracey Fraser, director of Career and Employment Services. "We have not had these kind of opportunities for our students in over 15 years."

Tim Henderson, assistant director of Career and Employment Services, said he was not surprised about the unemployment-rate decline.

"You could see it at our career fair," he said. "We had to make room in the Union because we did not have enough room for all of the companies that came to see our students. The activity of the market in general is very high, so it's a great time to find a job."

Fraser also said companies are coming out of K-State with a lot more than they bargained for.

"We just had an employer come in and interview 31 people and expected to ask back about eight or 10 people to interview again," Fraser said. "They ended up asking about 25 back."

Club to sponsor media diversity forum

HANG NGUYEN
senior staff writer

Members of K-State's Society of Professional Journalists are sponsoring a forum to discuss how journalists can improve coverage of diversity and multicultural issues on campus.

The diversity forum will be from 6 to 8 tonight in the Union Big 12 Room. It will consist of a panel discussion about diversity issues where members of the panel will answer questions and address concerns posed by audience members.

The following will be panelists: Scott Ladd, editor in chief of the Collegian; Brandi Hertig, opinion editor of the Collegian; J.J. Kuntz, editor of the Royal Purple; Barbara Hollingsworth, assistant editor of the Royal Purple; Len Potillo, general manager of KSBD-FM 91.9; and Richard Baker, news director of KKSU-AM 580.

"The Society of Professional Journalists encourages its student and professional chapters to sponsor programs about diversity issues in the news media," said Doug Daniel, assistant professor of journalism and SPJ chapter adviser.

"Members of the K-State chapter thought a forum bringing together minority students and groups in order to meet with campus media managers would help everyone think about how news coverage should go beyond the mainstream," he said.

Daniel said the idea for the forum

Diversity forum offers students chance to voice opinions, suggestions

Do the media ever piss you off? Do you wonder why the Collegian, KKSU-AM 580, KSDB-FM 91.9 or the Royal Purple do things the way they do? Do you have a story idea? Do you appreciate the coverage of a certain group that never was covered before?

Now is your chance to voice your concerns, opinions or praise.

K-State students will have an opportunity to speak to members of campus media organizations tonight during "Not Just Black and White: Diversity Issues in Campus Media." This forum, sponsored by the K-State chapter of the Society of Professional Journalists, will take place from 6 to 8 p.m. in the Big 12 Room of the K-State Student Union.

Events like this foster a better understanding between media outlets and the community. A dialogue between readers or listeners and representatives from media organizations, on neutral ground, is a healthy way to achieve the coverage readers want and deserve.

It also gives the media a chance to explain policy and procedures that affect the radio shows you hear and the newspapers and yearbooks you read.

Often, people do not take advantage of opportunities such as this to express their concerns or make positive comments. That is a shame. Dialogues like this one are the only way to ensure that the media know where their public is coming from.

SPJ has asked that audience members come prepared with questions or comments about the way the K-State media organizations cover multicultural issues and events. We ask that you come with an open mind. Ask questions and listen to the answers. Use this opportunity to focus not so much on past coverage, but instead on what the media can do to improve.

Rehashing old mistakes and opening old wounds is no way to make a change for the better. Instead, proposals for change and improvement should be presented to make the forum productive for all who attend.

Better working relationships between multicultural groups and media outlets are the goal of this forum.

They should be the goal of those who attend it as well.

wasting away again in the free-speech zone

SHANE FOSBURG/Collegian

▸ Zone has become a wasteland for Bibles and posters.

Everyone likes James Dean.

The hunky actor hit the movie screen like a bombshell in the 1950s, and thousands of teen-agers went wild. Everyone wanted to mimic the coolest guy in the country, the "Rebel Without a Cause."

This James Dean craze has seemingly filtered into the mid-1990s and onto our campus. However, the likeness has been slightly changed. We're no longer "rebels," we're simply "without a cause." I suppose the appropriate phrase is "one out of two ain't bad."

However in this case, batting .500 is not something to hang your hat on (you know, the white K-State hat that you bought because all of your fraternity brothers had one.)

If James Dean were still alive he'd probably say something like "Damn, I'm old." He would also call us apathetic, and he'd be right.

Feeding off the uncaring attitude of the '90s, we have become Generation-X hand-me-downs destined to leave the voting of our elected officials to the American Assoication of Retired Persons and the Chinese, and to perpetuate the apathetic attitudes that already fill our lives.

To validate our indifferent dispositions, we need look no further, and we probably won't, than the free-speech zone.

I'm going to go out on a limb and make the assumption that when the area was created it wasn't created as a haven for poster sales and the Gideons. (If I wanted another Bible, I'd take the free one provided in every Motel 6 room, thank you.) What aspect of free speech is being fulfilled by the "Superfly" or "Trainspotting" posters that so frequently litter the lawn outside the K-State Student Union?

Occasionally, students advocating right-to-life issues will fill the lawn with crosses, or a disgruntled mother will protest the Upward Bound program. However, the key word here is "occasionally." On any given day you are more likely to end up with a Visa/Mastercard after a Union visit than to have your mind filled with new ideas or arguments.

VIEWPOINT

CHRIS McLEMORE

CHRIS McLEMORE is a sophomore in political science and speech. You can send e-mail to Chris at clm1882@ksu.edu.

Granted, we don't have a Vietnam War to protest, but surely there are causes worthy of a few poster-board signs on sticks, causes that merit student time and involvement.

Take the movie "PCU" for example. It is a terrible cinematic experience (except for the guest appearance by George Clinton, funk-master extraordinaire), but it sheds light on student activism. Through constant protesting, the PCU students eventually prompt reform, and we get a happy ending with a dose of P-Funk on the side. While I don't suggest that you protest just for the sake of protesting, like the students in "PCU," I do suggest that you make your voice heard.

On-campus advocacy seems to wax and wane with the arrival of the MTV Rock the Vote program. It is time that this sense of pseudo-activism not only increases, but also becomes a mainstay. Axl Rose, with guitar accompaniment provided by Slash, stated on the "Use your Illusion I" album, "Don't damn me when I speak a piece of my mind 'cause silence isn't golden when I'm holding it inside."

True, Guns N' Roses might be a thing of the past, but Axl's eloquent lyrics remain constant. Even Axl realizes that getting support for important ideas can lead to elevated awareness and true change.

Rock on Axl.

It is also important to realize that when it comes to true activism, sidewalk chalk isn't going to cut it. Blunt statements scrawled in print on the cement outside of Seaton Hall are not highly successful persuasive endeavors. Standing in the free-speech zone with information about your cause would be a far superior way to protest. Petitions can also make a difference. Not only can you educate people about an issue, but also you can create a formidable group to promote change.

These ideas, when taken to heart, can ensure that we don't just sit and watch the world go by. We can become active members of an active society.

Franklin D. Roosevelt once said, "Freedom of speech is of no use to a man who has nothing to say." Indeed, lacking ideological keystones easily makes amazing rights invalid. What use is the free-speech zone if we refuse to use it? We, the apathetic inhabitants of the 1990s, need to become active citizens who make our voices heard.

You may disagree with these ideas, and if so, I urge you to protest them.

Campus beauty destroyed by concrete structures; buildings should have gabled roofs, windows

In the Riley County Historical Museum hangs a lithograph of this campus as it appeared in 1926. It is an aerial view taken from the same perspective as bird's-eye views of the modern campus that are sold as postcards, but it is incomparably more beautiful.

In 1926, most buildings on campus were totally native in architecture and construction, being essentially enlargements of scale upon the familiar architecture and building methods of settlers' houses in territorial Kansas.

VIEWPOINT

JONATHAN WINKLER

JONATHAN WINKLER is a senior in physics. You can send e-mail to Jonathan at jnw@ksu.edu.

Other architectural ideas had made only modest and usually pleasing inroads. Farrell Library then looked more like a medieval church than it does now even in spite of the much-trumpeted collegiate Gothic style of the new addition. Waters Hall reflects Louis Sullivan's emphasis upon functionality without borrowing the concomitant ugliness introduced by his less-skilled disciples.

Very few buildings lacked gabled roofs. Anderson, Burt, Willard, the old Denison, Farrell and the then still-standing art building all had sloping roofs with shingles to remind the casual onlooker that they were buildings on a university campus, not flat-topped functional appendages of the business world (College of Education).

Most edifices (especially Farrell and Willard) had enormous, church-sized windows to remind the world of their sacred function as places of learning.

What happened to all this? At some point in the past 71 years the evil spirit that oversees public architecture in Kansas looked upon this campus and saw that it was beautiful, and therefore, that it had to be destroyed. The chosen approach was twofold — poured concrete and addition after addition to existing buildings — and the construction done since 1926 reflects the bewildering and appalling variety of its application.

First, the old Denison Hall burned down. Its replacement is a dim, poorly lit and poorly heated shoebox inspired by World War II machine-gun pillboxes, topped with a flat asphalt roof trimmed on the edges with a strip of tin that looks disgusting against the bare limestone of the outer walls.

Then, the diffraction-grating style of building came into vogue. This is where the outer walls of a building — always configured as a shoebox — are alternating rows of glass and stone of about the same width.

This style was incorporated into the stacks that had to be added to Farrell Library in the 1950s and also in Umberger, Justin and Dykstra halls, which went up in roughly the same period. All four had asphalt roofs with tin trim in the same ugly style set by the resurrected Denison.

But the evil spirit could not be satisfied, because — in a rare fit of taste — Boyd and Putnam halls had gone up in a Gothic style that closely matched that set by their predecessor and immediate neighbor, Van Zile Hall.

So the 1960s and '70s brought more architectural monstrosities to compensate, such as Cardwell Hall with its shoebox pattern and windows that are either little arrow-slits or are raised so far above the floor that people inside get sunlight but can't see out.

Bluemont went Cardwell one better in its faithful reproduction of military fortifications: its square footprint and near-absence of windows is nothing but a machine-gun pillbox writ large.

While it has often been suggested that universities are the most appropriate place for experiments in architecture, precisely the opposite is true. In institutions such as this one architectural decisions are made by a small elite of tenured faculty and administrators and are usually not criticized by the apathetic student body, whereas in the larger world architecture is vigorously examined and commented upon by the public at large.

Furthermore, in cities where cars are the principal mode of transportation, urban sprawl usually gives ugly buildings enough room to stew in their own juices without poisoning the beauty of surrounding structures.

But on this campus buildings must be close to each other so that we can remain pedestrian-friendly, so a single bad-design decision spoils the harmony established by dozens of previous good ones.

The pending demolition of some of these aesthetic mistakes, such as Denison, provides an excellent opportunity for the university architect to establish a new building policy that will slowly undo the damage of the past 71 years.

This should require that all additions on campus match the style of their original building — even down to minor details such as the specific type of masonry, shape of windows and slope of roof — or else be physically separated so the eye can view the original edifice and its addition as separate structures.

Every new building should have a true gabled roof and windows large enough to reach most of the way to the ceiling from three feet above the floor. It should proudly trumpet its Kansas heritage, rather than slavishly copying misbegotten design trends doomed to disrepute and oblivion.

Periodical misconceptions explained

Editor,

I wanted to attempt to clear up some possible misconceptions that might exist regarding the proposed reductions in the level of journal funding, which has been proposed by the Task Force on Funding the Library for the 21st Century.

There seems to be a commonly held belief that this library task force, of which I am not a member, has recommended a massive across-the-board budget cut in all library journal funding and redirecting that money to electronic subscriptions.

Based on my understanding of its recommendations, this appears to be only half true. The task force is recommending a cut in journal funding with the money to be directed toward electronic subscriptions. However, the part about cutting journals 20-30 percent across the board is inaccurate. The original cut came from the dean of libraries in response to a rise in journal prices.

The task force has recommended that the proposed $500,000 in print subscriptions suspensions will be reduced to $300,000 in the following manner — a sliding scale of 5- to 20 percent reductions by cost center (usually department) based on the following three criteria:

1. rate of serial inflation
2. proportion of overall serial budget
3. average cost per periodical subscription

For example, if a department's serial group inflated at a rate lower than average, had a very low proportion of the serial budget and had a low cost per subscription, its 5-percent cut request was dropped from 30 to 5 percent.

The task force further encourages facilities to review their entire collections for additions as well as deletions, ultimately staying within their required budget reductions.

I hope this explanation clears up some of the old information about massive budget cuts. The task force's recommendations were made with the best interests of the library and university in mind. If you have any comments or suggestions for the task force, I would encourage you to contact Cynthia S. McCahon, task force chair.

K-State professor awarded for advances in education

JOHN HENDERSON
senior staff writer

K-State journalism and mass communications professor Carol Oukrop is the 1997-98 recipient of the Cruise Palmer Distinguished Professorship Award.

Oukrop was the director of journalism and mass communications at K-State from 1986 to 1997, and facilitated the 1988 transition of the department to its status as the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications.

"You can't imagine what a pleasure it is to work here," she said. "I'd almost hate to leave, it's so much fun."

She also created MC 612, Gender Issues and the Media, which she said had been considered as early as 1969, her first year on the faculty.

Oukrop balked at the idea for a long time, she said, because a lot of the material on the subject was insubstantial. She eventually acquired enough material for a curriculum and tried it during intersession, then as a course in the late '70s.

"When you're covering issues that deal with gender in the paper, it makes you more aware of what's involved," said Sara Smith, senior in mass communications, who has taken the class.

Oukrop said she doesn't consider herself a "flaming feminist," but she recognizes the need to examine gender issues in a world dominated by seemingly harmless but obviously masculine terms such as "master's degree." To get ahead, to some extent, women have to work and behave the same way men do, she said.

"Only recently have women realized that the male way is not necessarily the right way," she said. "People in my generation got where they are because we learned to think and act like white males."

She recently received an award for her outstanding contribution to journalism education from the American Educators of Journalism and Mass Communications.

Oukrop also coordinated the internship program, and has returned to the classroom full time, teaching Public Relations Campaigns.

"I always felt like I wasn't giving the courses that I taught adequate attention when I was director," she said.

The professorship is named for a 1938 alumnus of K-State and retired executive editor of The Kansas City Star. Palmer said he personally wanted to see Oukrop receive the award this year for her outstanding work.

Palmer said he was impressed with how Oukrop handled the school's naming and her use of donations to buy new equipment to teach computerized editing and pagination of newsprint.

"She's been at the top of the field throughout her career," he said. "I just have high regard for her efforts at K-State."

Oukrop

Oukrop will receive a $5,000 bonus in her salary this year, donated by Palmer.

"It was my feeling," Palmer said, "that there were so many scholarships for students that it would be a good idea to have something for the professors."

Oukrop said she's thrilled to receive the award.

"This is an exceptional place to work, this school," she said.

Oukrop is an accredited member of the Kansas chapter of Public Relations Society of America, has a bachelor's degree in journalism from the University of North Dakota, a master's in public relations and a doctorate in mass communications from the University of Iowa.

Bombing grand jury continues conspiracy allegation questioning

▸ OKLAHOMA CITY JURY QUESTIONS employee of elevator company.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

OKLAHOMA CITY — Elevator company employee Oscar Johnson returned Monday for more questioning by the county grand jury investigating the Oklahoma City bombing.

Johnson carried a blue container that appeared to hold photographs of the rubble of the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building. Johnson works for Mid-Western Elevator Co.

The grand jury is investigating allegations of a larger conspiracy in the April 19, 1995, bombing that killed 168 people and injured more than 500 others.

Johnson first testified in July that he does not believe an elevator in the building dropped several floors after the bombing.

Retired Drug Enforcement Administration agent David Schickendanz has said he and Alex McCauley, an agent of the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, were in one of the federal building's elevators when the blast hit.

Both men say the elevator they were in dropped from the eighth floor to the third floor.

State Rep. Charles Key, R-Oklahoma City, and the late Glenn Wilburn alleged that federal agents had prior knowledge of the bombing plot. Federal agents say they doubt a larger conspiracy, and they have vigorously denied any foreknowledge.

Johnson was the second witness called Monday. The first arrived at the grand jury's meeting room at 9:10 a.m. carrying what appeared to be a newspaper and a day planner. He did not identify himself and had no comment for reporters.

The Oklahoma County grand jury is expected to meet regularly through December. The panel has been meeting for portions of the past four months and has heard from more than 40 witnesses.

The last significant witness called before the grand jury was Carol Howe, a former Tulsa debutante and ex-informant for the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms who testified Oct. 8.

Howe has said she told her handlers before the bombing that she had overheard Tulsa white supremacist Dennis Mahon and German national Andreas Strassmeir discuss blowing up federal buildings. She is expected to make another appearance before the panel later.

Both Strassmeir and Mahon, who says he took the Fifth Amendment before the grand jury in July, deny any involvement in the bombing. Neither

Greek pairing process could change

COLE EHMKE
staff reporter

The bidding process through which sororities and fraternities select one another as partners for social functions and Homecoming competitions might change.

GREEK LIFE

Interfraternity Council, the governing board for K-State's 26 fraternities, agreed that the process has become too time-consuming because houses visit one another several times a week to compete.

One suggestion was to limit both the visits and the songs during each visit to one. Another suggestion was to involve IFC in the process by having it organize the pairings or coordinate the process. A third was to make a rotating schedule that would randomly match groups and eliminate the chance of the same pair occurring within a four-year period.

In other business, Greg Davis, IFC president and member of Sigma Phi Epsilon, said fraternities can improve their image through random surveys and interviews of what people on campus think. IFC and Panhellenic Council, a sorority governing board, would conduct the surveys.

Davis said his fraternity conducted a survey several years ago that showed it was not well-known. Because of the survey, the fraternity changed its philanthropy program and put more emphasis on grades. If the campus doesn't know who the leaders are, then they don't have any idea what the fraternity is, he said.

IFC also announced that Will Keim will speak on values and leadership at the all-greek chapter meeting at 7:30 p.m. Wednesday in McCain Auditorium. He is speaking as part of Greek 101, the orientation that pledges go through to acquaint them to greek and university life.

Davis said Keim is a good speaker and all greeks should attend, but the speech is also open to the public.

This week the K-State baseball team tries to finalize its roster for the next spring as its end its fall practice ends with the annual

Fall World Series

STORY BY DAN MERKER • PHOTO BY CLIF PAMLBERG

The Florida Marlins and Cleveland Indians aren't the only teams playing in the World Series this week. The K-State baseball team is playing its Fall World Series through Friday to wrap up fall practice.

The seven-game intrasquad series began Sunday with a double-header.

As per tradition, the teams were dispersed in a pre-series draft, and the losing squad will have to prepare and serve a meal to the winning team.

Head coach Mike Clark will be staying out of the kitchen and on the field. He said he is working on several things with the team this week including fundamentals.

"We're still in the evaluation phase. We're finalizing our roster for the spring," Clark said.

Players said offense is a point in practice as well.

"We've been working on situational hitting, moving runners," outfielder Kolin Morton said. "We're working on getting better as a team."

The Wildcats have a lot of holes to fill from last year's team. In addition to losing nine seniors at graduation, the Cats lost two more players — shortstop Heath Schesser and pitcher David Johnson — to professional baseball. Both were taken in the first 10 rounds of baseball's June Amateur Draft. In all, six players from last year's squad are now playing professionally.

"This week, the key is for us to come together as a team," pitcher Mickey Blount said. "There are so many new faces running around. This is the best time for us to come together, so when we come back in the spring, nothing will be new to us."

Clark said the team's biggest obstacle will be gaining valuable experience.

"We're very young. We've got new kids in there who are very inexperienced," Clark said. "We just hope that the young men we have continue to work hard. Until these kids get out there in Big 12 competition, we really won't know what they're going to do."

Despite losing so many players, Clark has confidence in the ability of the team, citing several team strengths.

"We're probably as talented behind the plate as we've ever been since I've been here. Our outfield is deeper, so I think ... defensively and offensively, we'll be in good shape," he said.

Already, Blount said, the work is noticeable.

"Every day, it seems like we're getting better," said Blount. "I think that, more than anything, is the most important thing. There's a lot of talent. It's just a matter of bringing it all together."

Pitching will be especially important this year. Clark said he doesn't want the team to have to score as many runs as it did last season, and doesn't think that will be necessary.

"The main thing we're concentrating on is throwing strikes. It was a big problem for us last year," Clark said. "We've got kids with great stuff. We just have to make sure that they're in the strike zone. I do like our arms. That is the strong part of our ball club."

Blount agreed that the key to the pitching staff's success will be throwing strikes.

"We want to just pitch and get ground ball outs. Our defense and pitching right now are extremely solid," he said. "Last year we had nine guys that could hit a three-run home run, and I think this year, we can't expect to put up 10 or 11 runs."

The pitching has been solid this week. So far, the final scores have been 4-1, 2-0 and 7-3.

Outfielder Brian Bobier injured his shoulder Monday diving for a ball. It is thought to be separated, but that has not been confirmed. How long he will be out of action is uncertain.

The teams will be managed by a different media personality every day. The team is playing single games from Oct. 20-24 at 3 p.m. Admission is free.

Women's cross country team places 2nd at Iowa State

JOEL WHITE
staff writer

The K-State women's cross country team had a strong showing last Saturday as they raced to a second-place finish in the Iowa State Memorial Cross Country Classic.

K-State finished with 70 points against a field, which included a number of conference and regional opponents. The meet winner, Minnesota, finished with 40 points.

The Wildcats took home two mugs, which are given to the top 10 individual finishers of the 5,000 meter course.

Freshman Annie Wetterhus led the Wildcats to a third-place finish with a time of 18:15. Wetterhus was eight seconds off the winning pace and one second out of second place.

The two runners that placed ahead of Wetterhus are from the University of Minnesota. They will compete against the Wildcats in the Midwest Regional Championships on the same course on Nov. 15.

Sophomore Kelly Andra followed close behind Wetterhus, finishing in fifth place with a time of 18:38.

Coach Randy Cole said he was excited about Andra's performance.

"Kelly put together her top race of the year," he said. "She really had the fire going throughout the race, and she's excited about continuing this success."

K-State's Emily Diederich, junior in kinesiology, who is primarily a middle distance runner in track, finished in 12th place with a time of 18:56.

Diederich said it was beneficial to run the course before the Regional Championships.

"It helps because we can prepare mentally for the tough spots on the course," she said.

The K-State men finished sixth with 131 points in the 12-team field. Iowa State won the men's division with 72 points.

Cole said that some of the men had breakthrough efforts on the hilly five-mile course.

Freshman Brandon Jessop finished 12th overall, but 11th out of all-collegiate runners with a time of 26:25.

"Brandon Jessop stuck his nose right in there with the lead pack and hung tough the whole way," he said.

One runner who placed ahead of Jessop was competing unattached.

Jessop said he is disappointed about not winning a mug, but he is satisfied with his race.

"I was in sixth place for the first three miles, but some of the guys had more strength in their legs, and they took it to me," Jessop said. "Next time I go there, I'm going to get a mug."

Senior Zach Davies had his best performance of the year with an 18th place finish overall in a time of 26:37.

"This was a confidence builder for me," Davies said. "It tells me I can be in the top 20 of the conference."

Although Davies had an improved effort, he said he is disappointed in the team's finish behind Big 12 Conference foes Iowa State and Kansas.

The cross country teams' attention now turns to the Big 12 Championships on Nov. 1.

Cole said he has confidence that his men's and women's teams will do well in the Conference meet.

"We are capable of finishing in the upper half of the Big 12," he said. "This has to be our goal."

Cats whip Drake in 3 straight

DAN MERKER

The K-State volleyball team took a night off from Big 12 play Monday to play the 3-14 Drake Bulldogs. The Wildcats beat Drake in three games to extend their winning streak to five matches.

"I don't think we clicked totally today," outside hitter Dawn Cady said. "I think we played all right."

The Cats kept the Bulldogs to a .065 hitting percentage for the match, and had nine blocks in a solid team defensive effort.

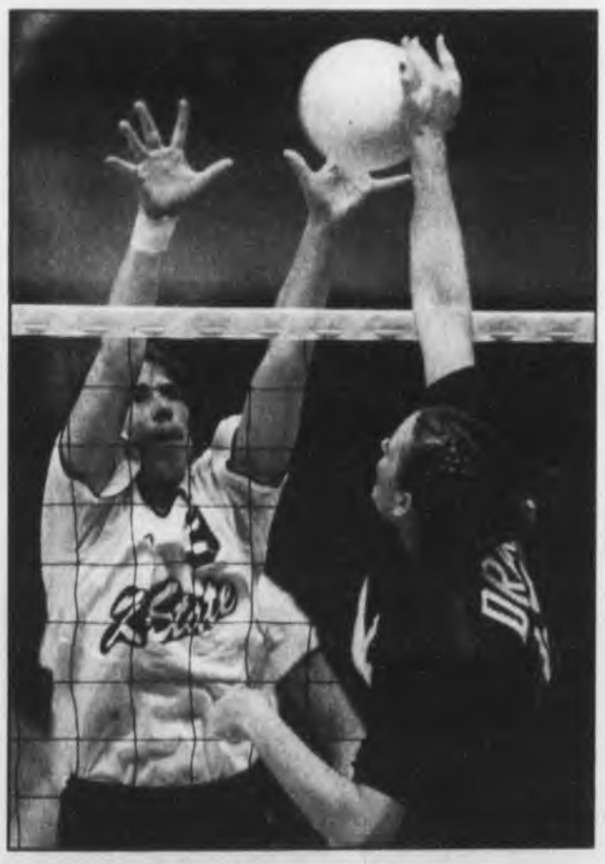
"We were blocking a lot of balls," said Coach Jim McLaughlin. "I thought our offense got a little better as we went along."

The Cats jumped out on the Bulldogs and took a 9-5 lead in the first game, but Drake scored four consecutive points to tie the game. The teams traded points and were tied at 11 points apiece until the Cats scored the final four points of the game. In the game, the Cats outhit the Bulldogs .220 to .179, with swing hitter Kim Zschau's seven kills leading the way.

In game two, the Bulldogs got the first point, but the Cats rattled off eight straight and cruised from there to take the game 15-6. K-State stepped up its hitting, improving to .275 for the second game, while its defense kept Drake to .083. The Cats had 20 digs in the game, which led to a lot of points and sideouts.



K-State continued to outplay the Bulldogs in game three. Drake scored three points before the Cats got a sideout. When the Cats did get the serve, they never looked back, scoring seven points in a row before Drake got another point to make the score 7-4. K-State again rallied for four consecutive points to take an 11-4 lead. The teams traded points until the Cats ended the game 15-7.

The Cats used game three to get some players who haven't seen much of the court this season into action.

Cady said the experience was good for some of the more inexperienced players. "It gets us some rest as well, so it's better for everybody," she said.

K-State dominated game three, especially defensively. Although the Cats only hit .182 in the game, they kept Drake to negative .083. The Bulldogs made 10 hitting errors in the game and had only seven kills.

Delta Upsilon wins all-university football championship with Hail Mary pass

MICHAEL RYAN
staff reporter

One of the most exciting plays in football won Delta Upsilon a fraternity division title in flag football Thursday night.

A Hail Mary pass, which is a pass play in which a number of receivers and defenders have a chance to catch the ball, ended the championship game in a dramatic fashion. The play enabled the DUs to triumph over defending champion Tau Kappa Epsilon.

Every fraternity league game has 25 plays per half, so there is no clock for players to watch.

Trailing 12-8 with only five plays remaining in the game, the DUs drove more than 40 yards to set up the 15-yard touchdown pass on the final play of the game.

Tad Melichar, senior in pre-medicine, caught the pass on his back after it had been deflected by teammate Greg Ahlquist, senior in biological and agricultural engineering and TKE player.

"It was a great feeling," DU quarterback and coach Brandon Schmidtberger said of the game's final play.

The DUs, who like every other team had struggled with the TKEs in the past, used their previous games against them to prepare.

"We played them really well in the Phi Delt tournament and in the past. We felt we knew what we could do against them," Schmidtberger, senior in accounting, said. "It was a bunch of players stepping up at each position and making plays."

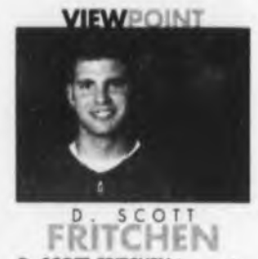
T.J. Trout, junior in feed science management and defensive player for the DUs, agreed with Schmidtberger that past games against the TKEs were a big help, but cited experience as the biggest factor.

"The majority of our team was juniors and seniors. That's what really made the difference this year," Trout said. "We've been playing together for so long."

The DUs, who went 9-1 on the year, went on to beat the independent champions, Polk High, for the all-university championship.

Other divisional winners were Haymaker 1 in the residence hall division, Showtime 1 in the co-recreational division and Alpha Chi Omega in the women's division.

Michael Bishop proves leadership through actions, not conversation



Michael Bishop doesn't say much these days.

For the past two weeks, Coach Bill Snyder has kept Bishop's mouth taped shut, saying he receives too much attention.

Now, all Bishop can be is the most athletic mime that K-State has known in a while. And since Bishop is not allowed to talk, all anybody does is ask about him.

People wonder how he felt after his record-setting 196-yard rushing performance against Missouri. People wonder how he limped back onto the field in the second half and played against Texas A&M on Saturday for more than 22 minutes with a bum ankle.

VIEWPOINT

D. SCOTT FRITCHEN

D. SCOTT FRITCHEN is a senior in mass communications. You can send your e-mail to Scott at dsf7477@ksu.edu.

People wonder how it feels to be a relatively new leader on a top-25 football team that until Saturday had a 5-19-1 record against ranked opponents.

They wonder after losing to Nebraska, how it felt to beat a Texas A&M team whose leading rusher was the trumpet player in the third row. They wonder what it's like to preserve a 41-5-1 home record, the fifth-best winning percentage in the country this decade.

Some K-State fans who grimaced when quarterbacks left the pocket, wonder why he didn't just drop back and throw the ball more like that Chad May guy a few years back.

ABC commentator Tim Brant wonders where he's been all his life.

Now that he's proved critics wrong against Texas A&M, critics wonder if he can knock off Colorado and guide the Wildcats to a bowl victory.

Mag White, Plymouth Holiday Bowl team selection committee member, stands on the K-State sideline wearing a red blazer and wonders what it would be like if 50,000 Wildcat fans invaded San Diego in December. (Sorry Mag, K-State fans only party on New Year's Eve these days.)

People wonder what it would feel like at the end of the season to be able to say they have led K-State to its best season ever. How it would feel to go 39-1 in three seasons of college football, and go into 1998 as a preseason first-team all-Big 12 selection.

One could see during K-State's media day that Bishop was the reporter's answer to K-State's offense. His face isn't even in the media guide, yet when his jersey was spotted on the field, he was shadowed by reporters for all but the five minutes it took for him to pose for team pictures.

Everything anybody knew about Bishop was displayed on a line of statistics in K-State's media guide.

This season, Bishop has showcased his playing ability.

True, Bishop is an unusual brand of K-State quarterback because he runs about as often as he throws, but he emits the same brand of competitiveness that Chad May had in 1994 and 1995.

Where May sparked concern the first time fans witnessed his "May-Day" helicopter passes that somehow ended up underneath Andre Coleman or Kevin Lockett, the same response evoked when Bishop lined up in shot-gun formation, pump-faked a throw and darted up the middle.

Now fans expect it. He pump-fakes a pass and runs. Fans hold their breath while he emerges from a pile-up and continues to turn upfield. Then everyone erupts in thunderous applause when he issues a hit of his own on a defender before going down.

Snyder firmly believes that individuals don't make football teams, yet each week opposing coaches have nightmares of Bishop tearing apart their defense.

"Bishop played outstanding," Texas A&M coach R.C. Slocum said after Bishop gained 226 offensive yards against the Aggies. "We were very concerned about his playing ability coming into this game. He is a significant part of K-State's offense."

It took time for K-State's wide receivers to adapt to the 80-mile-per-hour bullets. However, Bishop has learned to compromise. Now he throws 80 mile-per-hour rockets with a touch of finesse.

Bishop dropped back against Missouri and rifled a 44-yard dart with enough velocity to break concrete, but somehow it subsided with just enough finesse for Darnell McDonald to snag it with his fingertips in the back of the end zone.

Although Bishop can fake and juke almost any defender, he cannot shake the comparisons made between himself and former Nebraska All-American Tommie Frazier.

"You look back and see Mike going through a hole, and next thing you know you think he's down, and he's still going and still going," Eric Hickson said. "It's exciting."

Everyone continues to watch Bishop. They will continue to watch one of the greatest mimes to ever wear a K-State football uniform, and they will continue to cheer on K-State's newest leader.

When Bishop finally talks, everyone will listen.

ART AUCTION TO BENEFIT K-STATE ART SCHOLARSHIPS

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staffl writer

Manhattan doesn't have a Sotheby's or Christie's like New York City, but the glitter and exhilaration of the art market will unfold at the Columbian Theatre in Wamego for one evening.

A revival of the art department's traditional art auctions, which died out in the mid-1980s, will highlight a Nov. 1 fund-raiser at the historic theater. Alumni, community members and department faculty have donated more than 100 works to the auction, which will benefit the art department's scholarship fund.

Among the artists represented include native-Kansan Gordon Parks, New York alumni artists Doug Martin and Alan Shields, Ann Carter, Oscar Larmer and Ed Sturr. A print by the American realist George Bellows is perhaps among the most historically important pieces of art in the auction.

The auction was coordinated by Laura Fatemi, assistant to the gallery manager at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art, and Jeaneane Johnson, proprietor of Wamego Electric.

The two serve on the Art Department Advisory Board, which was established last year to assist the department with fund raising, student internships and special events.

It was Johnson who secured and paid for the use of the Columbian Theatre for the auction — which seems appropriate since a highlight of the theatre is the restored 1893 murals from the World Columbian Exposition.

Fatemi said she remembers having a lot of fun at the auctions she attended in the 1980s as a student, which were held in downtown Manhattan.

"I just think it will be a nice event to witness," Fatemi said. "Even if you don't have a lot of money, that's not the point."

Fatemi said she doesn't foresee the auction being an annual event, but possibly a biennial or triennial affair. She said the only reason the auctions died out was Pat Hagan's retirement in the 1980s. Hagan, along with Jack O'Shea, began the auctions in the early 1970s and kept them going through the 1980s.

"She just spent enormous hours on them," Fatemi said. "I can understand now because I've spent a lot of time."

Hagan will be honored at the auction for her support of the art department. Fatemi said she is especially grateful because she herself benefited from scholarship money raised by the auctions when she was a student.

The lapse in time between the last and the present auction has meant artists and lenders have been especially generous with their donations.

Fatemi said she was surprised with the quality of the work, especially the Bellows print, which isn't part of the exhibition since it isn't framed or matted.

"I know that was an expensive piece," Fatemi said.

Although some of the work will draw high prices, Fatemi said there will be some bargains to be had, even on student budgets.

Among some of the gems in the auction will be a print of the undated Gordon Parks photograph "Old Woman," which was taken in Fort Scott. Parks, director of the movie "Shaft," recently enjoyed success with a retrospective of his photography in New York City.

Prints by Kansas regional artist William Dickerson, subject of an upcoming Beach Museum show, are also included. A work by Overland Park artist Dean Mitchell, who will open a show in November at the Strecker Gallery, has recently been added to the auction.

Anna Holcombe, art department head, said she was thrilled with the response to the auction from the community.

"The variety is amazing," Holcombe said. "There has to be at least one thing someone will like out of the collection."

Holcombe, who has a ceramic work in the auction, said after looking at past auction records, there are usually a few people who end up buying a large share of the works.

However, she said she expects some of the work to be sold at bargain prices.

Louann Culley, associate professor of art, will be the auctioneer, although she will be relieved by some guest auctioneers throughout the evening. Each work's price will begin near an estimated value and then advance from there.

New York artist Wolf Kahn moves into Strecker Gallery

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

The work of New York artist Wolf Kahn is now showing in two Manhattan locations with the opening of a small selection of his landscapes at the Strecker Gallery.

Art Review

Although the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art exhibition of Kahn's come down Sunday the eight monoprints and drawings will remain at Strecker until Nov. 7.

The show was arranged between gallery owner Julie Strecker and Kahn's North Carolina representative, Jerold Melberg. The two met when Melberg was in town delivering a lecture on Kahn at the art museum.

Although Strecker said she was not representing Kahn full time, she said she has had some interest in his work from local and statewide patrons.

"I wouldn't be surprised if it didn't turn out that way," Strecker said. "We hope it works for the both of us."

Melberg will be representing Strecker-regular Dean Mitchell, an Overland Park artist, at his Charlotte, N.C., gallery. The two gallery owners will split their commissions.

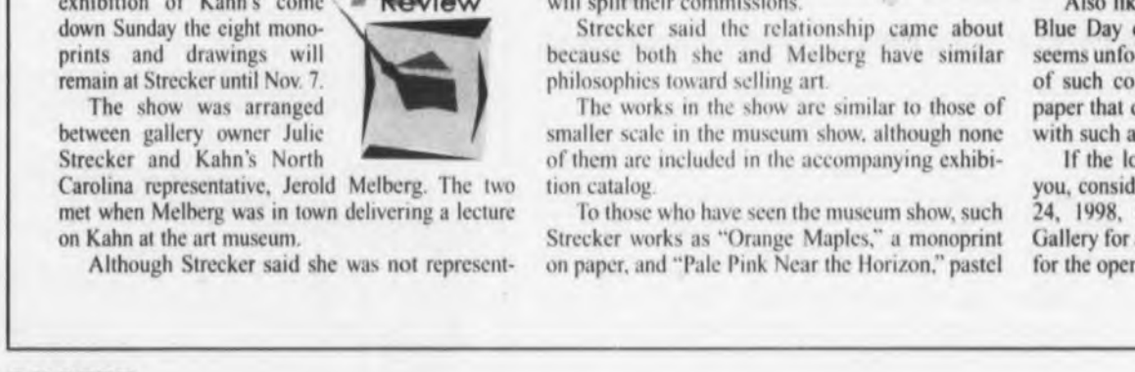
Strecker said the relationship came about because both she and Melberg have similar philosophies toward selling art.

The works in the show are similar to those of smaller scale in the museum show, although none of them are included in the accompanying exhibition catalog.

To those who have seen the museum show, such Strecker works as "Orange Maples," a monoprint on paper, and "Pale Pink Near the Horizon," pastel on paper, will recall larger sister works from the show. It's clear from the smaller size that Kahn is comfortable in any scale and still able to achieve the detail and texture of his larger pieces.

"Pale Pink" best illustrates Kahn's use of large swaths of color and his ability to conform that color to meaning through the application of other forms, in this case a line of spindly trees.

Also like the museum show, there are duds. "A Blue Day off Martin's Point," a pastel on paper, seems unfocused and pointless compared to a work of such contrasts as "River Sunset," a pastel on paper that daringly uses Kahn's signature hot pink with such autumnal colors as brown and gray.



If the local Kahn-mania hasn't caught up with you, consider day-tripping between Jan. 5 and Feb. 24, 1998, to Kansas City, Mo., to the Morgan Gallery for a large Kahn show. Kahn will be on hand for the opening from 5:30 to 9 p.m. on Jan. 5.

Works by Wolf Kahn will be at the Strecker Gallery through Nov. 7. Gallery hours are 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. Tuesday through Saturday. Call 537-2099 for more information.

College administrators pull papers

▸ NEWSPAPERS TAKEN FROM STANDS because of errors.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — A month ago, Kansas City, Kan., Community College administrators ordered about 500 copies of the student newspaper pulled from the racks and thrown away.

Now, the question being debated on campus is whether the action violated student journalists' First Amendment rights.

Administrators say they were within their rights and their motive was simply to avoid embarrassment. They said a large number of spelling and style errors on the front page of the school year's first edition of The Advocate justified disposing of about 500 copies.

"It's not a representation of our student body," said Kaye Walter, college vice president for academic services, who ordered the copies confiscated.

Editors, on the other hand, say even flawed expression is protected.

"I have a problem with this whole we-did-it-to-protect-you approach," said managing editor Tony Jappa, whose editorial in Friday's Advocate called the action "unprofessional and uncalled for."

"We are a college paper, and it's a learning process," Jappa said. "Instructors should support it, whether it's good or bad."

A lawyer with the Student Press Law Center, a nonprofit organization in Arlington, Va., that provides legal assistance to student journalists, said in a telephone interview that the administration censored the news and needs a First Amendment lesson.

"It's clearly unconstitutional what's happened there," Mike Hiestand said. "The law is very clear: Student editors at a public college university are wholly responsible for controlling the content of their student publication. Under the law, school officials maintain a hands-off policy. This includes grammatical and typographical errors."

About 2,500 issues of the first edition were published on Sept. 16. Of those, about 350 were mailed out and the rest were placed on stands throughout the school. The paper is free.

The papers were on the stands three days when Walter acted. She said she had received several complaints from faculty members and students about front-page errors.

"We do take our responsibility as educators seriously," she said. "And part of being a responsible journalist is not putting out a paper that contains 50 errors on the front page."

Walter said she showed the paper to Deloris Pinkard, vice president of executive services, and both agreed the paper was an embarrassment to the college. Walter said that on Sept. 19 she had maintenance workers gather up about 500 copies that remained on the stands.

The newspaper's faculty adviser, Lisa Elder, said she considered the action equivalent to censorship. She acknowledged there were errors but added, "That is no reason to take it from the stands."

She said most of the errors grew out of a faulty spell-check feature in the newspaper's computer system.

Walter said it was her intention that the copies be held until Advocate editors could review them.

But later, when asked what to do with the papers, Pinkard told a maintenance employee to dispose of them.

Jappa said Pinkard's estimate of 50 errors was an exaggeration; by his count it was 11. He said administrators never notified editors or staff members about the decision.

The eight-page tabloid is supposed to be published every other week, but Friday's was only the second edition of the year. Jappa said editors held off on printing the second edition until they could adequately research and prepare a follow-up story on the removal of the papers.

Research discovers new bacteria in undercooked chicken, turkey

▸ SYMPTOMS OF DISEASE INCLUDE cramps, abdominal pain.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — A type of bacteria that might sicken and sometimes kill people who eat undercooked chicken or turkey is becoming more common and is developing resistance to antibiotics, The New York Times reported Monday.

Estimates put the number of cases of the disease caused by the germ campylobacter at 2 million to 8 million a year in the United States and deaths at 200 to 800, the Times said.

The illness usually lasts about a week, and its symptoms include cramps, abdominal pain, bloody diarrhea and fever. It can be as severe as the disease caused by salmonella, another germ found in undercooked poultry, but causes fewer fatalities, according to Dr. Bert Bartleson of Washington state's Health Department.

Recent research also suggests that campylobacter might lead to the severe and sometimes fatal nerve damage caused by Guillain-Barre syndrome. About 20 percent to 40 percent of the 5,000 cases a year of Guillain-Barre syndrome follows a bout of campylobacter infection.

Researchers say the campylobacter germ infects 70 percent to 90 percent of all chickens. That's a higher estimate than one six years ago by the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, which had said 30 percent to 70 percent of chickens carried it.

The use of antibiotics known as fluoroquinolones to treat the infection in chickens has created strains of drug-resistant campylobacter in humans.

"Since 1995, with the licensing of fluoroquinolones for use in chickens, levels of drug-resistant campylobacter in humans has gone up dramatically," said Dr. Michael Osterholm of the Minnesota Health Department.

His department randomly sampled poultry in Minnesota supermarkets and found 70 percent of chickens were contaminated with the germ; of those, 20 percent had the drug-resistant strain. For turkeys, 58 percent were contaminated and 84 percent of those had the drug-resistant strain.

Scientists believe the public is more aware of salmonella than the more widespread campylobacter because the latter is hard to pronounce and spell and there is no simple laboratory test to detect it.

For both germs, the safety advice is the same: Cook poultry thoroughly, and carefully wash anything that has come into contact with raw poultry or its juices.

International Student Center expands facilities

LESLIE NACHTRAB
staff reporter

A doubled growth of international students and scholars attending K-State in the past 20 years has led to K-State's International Student Center expanding its facilities.

To kick off the construction, the center is having a groundbreaking ceremony at 2 p.m. Nov. 7 in the center's courtyard.

The expansion will be divided into three phases, Donna Davis, director of the International Student Center, said.

The first phase will add office space, a student services wing and a student resource center. The architect is Raphael Architects Inc., of Kansas City, Mo. Davis said this is the firm's first project on campus.

The first phase of the expansion is estimated to cost $300,000.

Davis said the center already has collected money to cover the expenses. She said she hopes to have the first phase completed by spring 1999.

Joe Tiao, a member of the planning committee, donated about $250,000 to the expansion project. He collected the money from Taiwanese alumni and friends. Tiao said having the International Student Center on campus was important to him.

"The U.S. should know other countries' culture," Tiao said. He said that with today's international economies, "we need to know each other better than ever before."

Davis said to recognize Tiao's effort, the added wing will be dedicated the Taiwan Wing.

Davis said the wing will include a student work area, four office spaces, storage space, a reception area and a small patio.

Davis said she hopes to add to the patio space in future phases of the expansion.

Do Sup Chung raised $40,000 for the second part of phase one, the Korean Room. The new room will be a television-multimedia resource center for students. Students will also have access to international news through computer terminals.

Davis said the center is looking for a way to keep the resource center open 24 hours to deal with different time zones around the world.

Ruth Ann Wefald and Bob Kruh are co-chair of the committee planning the expansion. In addition to the added office space and student services, they are also addressing the need for a children's area.

"The present building isn't really user-friendly when it comes to parents with children," Davis said.

She said she hopes enough money will be left over from phase one to take some present space to create a temporary children's room.

"Ruth Ann and Bob Kruh have both been sensitive to the need for children space," Davis said. "Right now, all there really is to do for the children is to run up and down the halls, which isn't very safe."

The center is already planning fundraising activities to raise money for the other phases.

Ed King, the donor for the original buildings built in 1977, has established a winery in the northwestern region of the United States, Davis said. She said he is offering to provide wine and cookbooks to have a wine and tea dessert party to raise money for the center.

For the past two years, the center's staff has had its Magic Carpet Extravaganza, a Persian carpet sale.

Davis said the center has been able to raise between $8,000 and $10,000 from the event by receiving a percentage of the sales.

The center's staff also plans to focus more on alumni.

"We'll also try to do some more alumni contacting," Davis said. "Hopefully, as people see the plans now and the construction, that will generate some more interest in the center. But right now it's pretty exciting."

Davis said she thought the expansion was adding a different dimension to the staff's role.

"With the expansion, I think there's a big responsibility on the staff now to really focus on some creative and programming ideas to get more people down here to use the building more."

Davis encourages all K-State students to use the center.

"International student is an inclusive word. That means whether you're from Liberal, Kan., or Jakarta, Indonesia, you're an international person. We'd like more domestic students to realize they, too, are international, and they can be a part of our program."

"With all the changes, it's a really good time to sit back and look at the programs we have and look at what else we can do."

MONOPOLY

news for Microsoft about their new browser, which has gotten very strong technical reviews but seems to be having some trouble on the legal front," said Dwight Davis of Windows Watcher newsletter in Redmond.

If U.S. District Judge Thomas Penfield Jackson agrees Microsoft violated the court order but Microsoft continues the questioned licensing, the government wants a record $1 million daily fine, well above the $10,000 a day it usually requests in antitrust contempt actions. Microsoft has 11 days to file a written response. A hearing is likely later.

"This is a very serious abuse," said Assistant Attorney General Joel I. Klein, head of the antitrust division. He said Microsoft's action was designed to undermine the dominant market position of Netscape's browser.

Internet browsers are important, Klein said, because they "could erode Microsoft's operating system monopoly."

The government told the court that "as Microsoft fears, browsers have the potential to become both alternative 'platforms' on which various software applications and programs can run and alternative 'interfaces' that PC users can employ to obtain and work with such applications and programs."

Indeed, Oracle, Sun Microsystems, Netscape and other companies are working on low-cost personal computers that consumers could use to pull software off the Internet as needed rather than having stored on their computer's operating system.

Microsoft's new software blurs the line between personal computers and the Internet. By working closely with Windows 95, Internet Explorer lets people easily point and click between desktop files and Web sites.

Klein argued the Windows operating system and Internet Explorer are two different products and should be sold separately. "Each of Microsoft's products should compete on its own merits."

But Microsoft senior vice president William Neukom said that, although the consent decree prohibits conditioning the license of one product on licensing another product, it explicitly does not prohibit the company from developing integrated products.

He said Windows 95 was an integrated product. Including the browser was "the most logical next step" after including tools to allow users to obtain information from the computer's hard drive or a compact disc, Neukom said.

Klein said antitrust law does not bar monopolies achieved by a company's talent and foresight, but does prevent abuse of that monopoly.

"When you use the monopoly to snuff out a new entrant, ... the ultimate cost is very serious," Klein said. "You want to encourage ... innovations that might really change the way we do computing."

The government asked that Microsoft be required to notify Windows 95 users that they are not required to use Internet Explorer and to instruct them how to remove the visual Internet Explorer icon from their computer desktop. Microsoft's Murray noted that there are computers available with Netscape Navigator preinstalled along with Windows.

Klein said the Justice Department is still investigating Microsoft in regard to other business practices and its acquisition of a share of Apple Computer and several video technology firms.

FORUM

stemmed from SPJ's concern about the media's unbalanced coverage.

"For generations women, ethnic groups and other minorities were virtually ignored by the mainstream news media. Stereotypes and ignorance thrived because of the lack of balanced coverage. That's changed for the better in the last decade or two," Daniel said.

"But journalists need to remind themselves not to be complacent. The forum our members have planned will try to spark better understanding rather than debate about coverage," he said.

Brandi Hertig, panelist and sophomore in journalism, said she agrees.

"As a staff member of the Collegian, I feel that all campus media can benefit from a diversity forum," Hertig said. "A lot of the multicultural organizations on this campus tend to be small and are easy to overlook. We need to be more sensitive to their needs and activities."

Travis Lenkner, freshman in journalism and SPJ member, said SPJ hopes the forum will improve the working atmosphere between multicultural groups and the media outlets they work with. The forum is also there to foster understanding for both parties.

"We want multicultural students and groups to understand how and why events are covered and how their issues are dealt with by the media groups, and we want the media groups to understand multicultural students' concerns and questions about those issues as well," he said.

Issues discussed at the diversity forum don't just affect multicultural students.

"These are issues that should concern everyone because everyone is reached by campus media in some way. It should be a learning experience for the panelists, SPJ members and everyone who attends," Lenkner said.

The diversity forum is open to all students.

"Anyone can participate. We want to particularly invite multicultural students to attend as these issues affect them on a daily basis, but the issues that will be discussed really do impact everyone on campus in one way or another, which is why we're encouraging anyone who can make time to attend the event," Lenkner said.

Because the forum is in a question-and-answer format, audience members can steer the discussion in any direction they choose.

However, they must stay within the bounds of the general idea of the forum. If they choose to make a comment, a moderator will ask them to end with a question. This will give the panel something to respond to.

"The idea isn't to argue over the merits of coverage," Daniel said. "I'd like to see how members of the campus community tell those who run campus media how they can improve coverage of issues and events outside the mainstream. I hope the media representatives listen and learn."

COMMITTEE

"This is a tall order to have for any person who heads up the commission," Roberts said.

Flinchbaugh, who has worked on several farm bills and served as technical adviser to several committees since 1968, said this was the first appointment he has accepted.

"I think I was picked to chair because I come out of an academical world and have not been labeled to a political party. I also have a long-term working relationship with Roberts and (Dan) Glickman,(Secretary of Agriculture)," he said.

Flinchbaugh said he has had an interest in politics since he was a little boy.

He received a degree in animal science from Penn State and went on to get his doctorate at Purdue in agricultural economics. He came to K-State as an agricultural economics professor in 1971.

"I was fortunate to come to Kansas," Flinchbaugh said. "I woke up one morning and my two good friends that I worked with for years had become the secretary of agriculture and chairman of the house agriculture committee. At my standpoint — tremendous opportunity."

Roberts said Flinchbaugh was known all over the country for his expertise in agriculture policy. He believes the appointment will be beneficial to K-State.

"This will be a feather in K-State's cap," Roberts said. "The appointment says a great deal on behalf of K-State that he will be determining many future policies."

Daniel Bernardo, department head of agricultural economics, said he thought this was an accomplishment for Flinchbaugh.

"Barry has operated somewhat behind the scenes for many years. This gives him some well-deserved notoriety," Bernardo said.

The appointment was an honor, but will be a challenge also, Flinchbaugh said.

"It's going to be a great experience. I may learn more than I impart. So far, I'm very impressed with the members appointed. There's quite a bit of interest in this commission, if we can do the job right," he said.

With the farm bill only a year old, Flinchbaugh said it was too soon to see the effects clearly.

He said before the commission disbands on Jan. 1, 2001, it will conduct hard-figured cost and benefit analysis of all available farm-policy options.

"I'm going to work real hard as chair so this isn't a political road show," he said. "We'll get a good thorough objective analysis and let the political system go from there."

DRAKE

For the match, K-State kept three Bulldogs' players to a negative hitting percentage, and as a team, Drake hit only .065. Setter Devon Ryning had 34 assists for the Cats to lead the team. Zschau's 11 digs and 16 kills led K-State. Cady was close behind with 15 kills.

McLaughlin said he was happy with Cady's performance.

"She's hitting hard, and she's hitting with range," McLaughlin said.

Heather Lindell again started for Alexis Shepherd, who spent another match on the sidelines for disciplinary reasons.

"The deal with her was missing class," McLaughlin said. "If you miss class, you don't play or practice. We have a standard in the classroom here."

McLaughlin said she might not be back for matches against Texas A&M and Texas this weekend, but definitely will return by Oct. 31.
